KEY TO PRONUNCIATION.*

a as in fat, man, pang.
 ā as in fate, mane, dale
 h as in far, father, guard.
 k as in full, talk, naught.
 ſ as in ask, fast, ant.
 z as in fair, hair, bear.

o as in met, pen, bless ō as in mete, meet, meat.
 6 as in her, fern, heard.

i as in pin, it, biscuit.
 ī as in pine, light, file.

o as in not, on, frog.
 o as in note, poke, floor
 ō as in move, spoon, room.
 6 as in nor, song, off.

u as in tub, son, blood.
 ū as in mute, acute, few (also new, tube, duty; see Preface, pp. ix, x).
 ū as in pull, book, could.
 ū German ū, French u.

oi as in oil, joint, boy.
 ou as in pound, proud, now.

A single dot under a vowel in an unaccented syllable indicates its abbreviation and lightening, without absolute loss of its distinctive quality. See Preface, p. xi. Thus.

ā as in prelate, courage, captain.
 ē as in ablegate, episcopal ō as in abrogate, eulogy, democrat u as in singular, education

A double dot under a vowel in an unaccented syllable indicates that, even in the mouths of the best speakers, its sound is variable to, and in ordinary utterance actually becomes, the short u sound (of but, pun, etc.). See Preface, p. xi. Thus ā as in errant, republican.

 ō as in prudent, difference.
 ū as in charity, density.
 ū as in valor, actor, amot.

ā as in Persia, peninsula.
 ē as in the book.
 u as in nature, feature.

A mark (˘) under the consonants t, d, s, z indicates that they in like manner are variable to ch, j, sh, zh. Thus.

t˘ as in nature, adventure.
 d˘ as in arduous, education.
 s˘ as in pressure.
 z˘ as in seizure.

th as in thin.
 th as in then ch as in German ach, Scotch loch.
 n French nasalizing n, as in ton, en.
 ly (in French words) French liquid (monillé) l.
 ' denotes a primary, * a secondary accent. (A secondary accent is not marked if at its regular interval of two syllables from the primary, or from another secondary.)

SIGNS.

< read from; i. e., derived from > read whence; i. e., from which is derived.
 + read and; i. e., compounded with or with suffix = read cognate with; i. e., etymologically parallel with.

✓ read root.
 * read theoretical or alleged, i. e., theoretically assumed, or asserted but unverified, form.
 † read absolute.

SPECIAL EXPLANATIONS.

A superior figure placed after a title word indicates that the word so marked is distinct etymologically from other words, following or preceding it, spelled in the same manner and marked with different numbers. Thus back¹ (bak), n. The posterior part, etc.

 back¹ (bak), a. Lying or being behind, etc.
 back¹ (bak), v. To furnish with a back, etc.
 back² (bak), adv. Behind, etc.
 back² (bak), n. The earlier form of bat?
 back³ (bāk), n. A large flat bottomed boat, etc.

Various abbreviations have been used in the credits to the quotations, as "N^o" for number, "st." for stanza, "p" for page, "l" for line, "¶" for paragraph, "fol." for folio. The method used in indicating the subdivisions of books will be understood by reference to the following plan.

Section only § 5
 Chapter only xiv.
 Canto only xiv.
 Book only iii.

Book and chapter }
 Part and chapter }
 Book and line }
 Book and page }
 Act and scene }
 Chapter and verse }
 No. and page }
 Volume and page }
 Volume and chapter }
 Part, book and chapter }
 Part, canto, and stanza } Chapter and section or ¶ } Volume, part, and section or ¶ } Book, chapter, and section or ¶ }
 i. i. § or ¶ 6.
 i. i. § or ¶ 6.

Different grammatical phases of the same word are grouped under one head, and distinguished by the Roman numerals I., II., III., etc. This applies to transitive and intransitive uses of the same verb, to adjectives used also as nouns, to nouns used also as adjectives, to adverbs used also as prepositions or conjunctions, etc.

The capitalizing and italicizing of certain or all of the words in a synonym-list indicates that the words so distinguished are discriminated in the text immediately following, or under the title referred to.

The figures by which the synonym-lists are sometimes divided indicate the senses or definitions with which they are connected.

The title words begin with a small (lower-case) letter, or with a capital, according to usage. When usage differs, in this matter, with the different senses of a word, the abbreviations [cap.] for "capital" and [l. c.] for "lower-case" are used to indicate this variation.

The difference observed in regard to the capitalizing of the second element in zoological and botanical terms is in accordance with the existing usage in the two sciences. Thus, in zoology, in a scientific name consisting of two words the second of which is derived from a proper name, only the first would be capitalized. But a name of similar derivation in botany would have the second element also capitalized.

The names of zoological and botanical classes, orders, families, genera, etc., have been uniformly italicized, in accordance with the present usage of scientific writers.

drop (drɒp), v. [*< ME. droppen, rarely dropen, dropan, drop, esp. from sorrow, < Icel. dröpa, drop, esp. from sorrow, a secondary verb, < drýpa = AS. dreþan, drop: see drop and drip.] I. intr. 1. To sink or hang down; bend or hang downward, as from weakness or exhaustion.

(Colloq. western U. S.)

These desperadoes always try to get the drop on a foe that is, to take him at a disadvantage before he can use his own weapon. T. Hammett, The Century, XXXV, 501

To have a drop in one's eye, to be drunk. (Slang.)

O faith, Colneel, you must own you had a drop in your eye; for when I left you, you were half seas over.

Swift, Polite Conversation, I

dropax (drō'paks), n. [Gr. δραξ, a pitch-plaster, δραξω, pluck, pluck off.] A preparation for removing hair from the skin; a depilatory. [Rare or unused.]

drop-bar (drōp'bār), n. In printing, a bar or roller attached to a printing-press for the purpose of regulating the passage of the sheet to impression. In the rotary press the bar drops at a fixed time on the edge of the sheet, and with an eccentric revolving motion draws it forward. In some forms of the cylinder press the bar drops on the edge of the sheet and holds it firmly in position until it is seized by the grippers. Also called drop-coller.

drop-black (drōp'blak), n. See black.

drop-bottom (drōp'bot'um), n. A bottom, as of a car, which can be let fall or opened downward: a common device for unloading certain kinds of railroad-cars.

drop-box (drōp'boke), n. In a figure-weaving loom, a box for holding a number of shuttles, each carrying its own color, and so arranged that any one of the shuttles can be brought into action as required by the pattern.

drop-curls (drōp'kériz), n. pl. Curls dropping loose from the temples or sides of the head.

drop-curtain (drōp'kér'tān), n. Same as drop, 9 (c).

drop-drill (drōp'drill), n. An agricultural implement which drops seed and manure into the soil simultaneously. See drill, 3.

drop-fingers (drōp'fing'gérz), n. pl. In printing, two or more finger-like rods attached to some forms of cylinder printing-presses for the purpose of holding the sheet in fixed position until it is seized by the grippers.

drop-fly (drōp'flī), n. In angling, same as drop-per, 4.

drop-forging (drōp'fór'jīng), n. A forging produced by a drop-press.

drop-glass (drōp'glās), n. A dropping-tube or pipette, used for dropping a liquid into the eye or elsewhere.

drop-hammer (drōp'hām'er), n. Same as drop-press.

drop-handle (drōp'hān'el), n. A form of needle-telegraph instrument in which the circuit-making device is operated by a handle projecting downward.

drop-keel (drōp'kel), n. Naut., same as cent-board. (Eng.)

droplet (drōp'let), n. [< drop + -let] A little drop.

Though thou abhorst dew in us our human life, Scorn'd at our brains' dot, and those our droplets watch From nigard nature fall. Shak., T. of A., 1, 1 drop-letter (drōp'let'ér), n. A letter intended for a person residing within the delivery of the post-office where it is posted. (U. S.)

drop-light (drōp'lit), n. A portable gas-burner, generally in the form of a lamp, connected with a chandelier or other gas-fixture by a metallic or flexible tube.

dropping (drōp'ling), n. [< drop + -ling]. A little drop. Daries. [Rare.]

Highly to speak, what Man we call and count,

It is a branding of Divinity,

It is a dropping of the Eternal Fount.

It is a moatling hatch of the Unity

Sylvestre, Quadrains of Fibre, st. 12.

dropmeal (drōp'mēl), adv. [< ME. dropenale, < AS. dropmālan, by drops, < dropa, drop, + mēlan, dat. pl. of māl, a portion, time, etc.; see meal]. Drop by drop; in small portions at a time.

Distilling drop-meale a little at one e in that proportion and measure as thirst requirith drop-net (drōp'net), n. 1. A kind of light cross-woven lace.—2. A net suspended from a boom and suddenly let fall on a passing school of fish.

dropper (drōp'ér), n. [< drop + -er]. 1. One who or that which drops. Specifically—(a) A glass tube with an elastic cap at one end and a small orifice at the other, for drawing in a liquid and expelling it in drops, a pipette. Also dropping tube. (b) A reaping machine that deposits the cut grain in gables on the ground, so called to distinguish it from one that merely cuts, or cuts and binds. See reaper.

It causes a Westerner to laugh to see small grain being cut with a dropper or a self reaping reaper.

Sci. Amer., N. S., LV, 373.

(c) Among florists, a descending shoot produced by seedling bulbs of tulips, instead of a renewal of the bulb upon the radical plate, as in the later method of reproduction.

2. In mining, a branch or spur connecting with the main lode; nearly the same as feeder, except that the latter more generally carries the idea of an enrichment of the lode with which it unites.—3. A dog which is a cross between a pointer and a setter.—4. An artificial fly adjusted to a leader above the stretcher fly, used in angling. Also called bobber and drop-fly. See whip.

And observe, that if your droppers be larger than, or even as large as your stretcher, you will not be able to throw a good line. T. Walton complete Angler, II, 3, note dropping (drōp'ing), n. [< ME. droppynge, < AS. dropung, a dropping, verbal n. of dropian, drop; see drop, v.] 1. The act of falling in drops; a falling.

A continual dropping in a very rainy day and a contentious woman are alike.

Prov. xviii, 1

2. That which drops or is dropped; generally in the plural.

Like eager droppings into milk. Shak., Hamlet, I, 5

All the Country is overgrown with trees, whose drop-pings continually turneth their grass to weeds, by reason of the rankness of the ground, which would some be amended by good husbandry.

Capt. John Smith, True Travels, I, 121

Specifically—3. pl. Dung; especially said of the dung of fowls; as, the droppings of the hen-roost.

—4. In glass-making, one of the lumps or globules formed in the glass by the glazing of the clay cover of the melting-vessel and its combination with the volatilized alkalis. The crude glass thus formed on the cover drops into the molten glass in the vessel, rendering it defective.

dropping-bottle (drōp'ing-bot'l), n. An instrument for supplying small quantities of water to test-tubes, etc.; an adductor.

dropping-tube (drōp'ing-tūb), n. Same as dropper, 1 (a).

drop-press (drōp'pres), n. A swaging, stamping, or forging-machine having either a regular or an intermittent motion. It is essentially a power hammer moving between vertical guides, and delivering a dead stroke blow either from its own weight or by weight combined with power. In simple machines the weight is raised above the anvil by hand by means of a cord, and let fall, but as these machines are wasteful of labor they have been largely superseded by power-machines, in which the weight is raised by a strap wound over a drum, or by a wooden disk pressed between two pulleys revolving in opposite directions, or by direct connection with a wrist on a disk wheel. The weight is either released at any point of its path by some device controlled by a lever within reach of the operator's hand or foot, or it descends by the movement of the disk. If a spring is interposed between the weight and the lifting apparatus, which is its form, to absorb the shock, it is called a dead-blow hammer or press. In the drop-presses employing a strap or other lifting device that is released at the will of the operator, the blows are intermittent. When the connection with a wheel is direct, the blows are regular and uniform so long as the machine works. All things dropped from hot metals on a drop-press, such as small parts of machines are called drop-forgings. The drop-press is sometimes called simply press, and sometimes drop hammer. It should not be confounded with the stamping-press, which, while it is allied to the drop-press, differs essentially in its manner of working.

drop-ripe (drōp'rip), a. So ripe as to be ready to drop from the tree. Daries. [Rare.]

The fruit was now drop-ripe, we may say, and fell by a shake.

Coryell, Miss., IV, 264

drop-roller (drōp'rō'ler), n. 1. Same as dropper.—2. In press-work, an inking-roller which drops at regulated intervals, with a supply of printing-ink, on the distributing-table or distributing-rollers. Also known as the doctor or doctor-roller.

drop-scene (drōp'sēn), n. Same as drop, 9 (c).

dropseed-grass (drōp'sēd-grās), n. A name given to species of Sporobolus and Muhlenbergia.

drop-shutter (drōp'shut'er), n. In photog., a device for rendering the exposure of a plate in a camera very brief: used in instantaneous photography. The most simple form, also known as the quillotine shutter, and the one that gives a name to all other appliances of the kind, consists of two opaque pieces, each pierced with a hole, and arranged to slide one over the other. One of the pieces is fitted over the lens-tube, and when the openings in the two pieces are in line, the shutter admits light to the camera. When it is desired to make a very short exposure, the movable slide is raised till the opening of the tube is closed. On letting the slide fall, the opening in it passes before that in the fixed piece, and for an instant light is admitted to the plate behind the lens. To accelerate the fall of the slide, various devices are used, as springs or elastic bands. Improved drop shutters have the form of revolving disks actuated by springs, etc., or that of flap-shutters controlled by a pneumatic device, etc.; and in many the opening is made to take place eccentrically, or the holes in the shutters are cut of various shapes, with the object of distributing the light, and giving a greater volume of light to the foreground or the lower portion of the picture, which is naturally not so well lighted as the higher portions.

dropsical (drōp'si-kāl), a. [< drop + -ical]. 1. Affected with dropsy; inclined to dropsy.

Lucerna towards his latter end grew dropsical and inactive. Wolfe, Anecdotes of Faloutz, IV, 1

2. Resembling or partaking of the nature of dropsy.

dropsicalness (drōp'si-kāl-nes), n. The state of being dropsical. Barley, 1727.

dropsied (drōp'sid), a. [< drop + -ied]. Increased with dropsy; unnaturally swollen; exhibiting an unhealthy inflation.

Where great additions swell, and virtue none, It is a dropsied honour. Shak., All's Well II, 2 dropstone (drōp'stōn), n. A stalactitic variety of calcite. See stalactite.

dropsy (drōp'si), n. [Early mod. E. also dropæ; < ME. dropy, dropsy, abbr. by aphæresis of ydropsis, hydropsis; see hydropy.] 1. In med., a morbid accumulation of watery liquid in any cavity of the body or in the tissues. See edema, anasarca, and ascitis.

And lo a man syk in the droppe was before him.

Wells, Luke xiv.

But the sad Droppe fivezeth it extreme, Till all the blood be turn'd into foam.

Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas a Weeks, II, The Furies.

2. In bot., a disease in succulent plants caused by an excess of water.—3. In fish-culture, a disease of young trout. Before the food sac is gone the trout are often affected with a swelling over the sac, where a membrane forms, swells out, and is filled with a watery substance. An incision is sometimes made in the swelling to let out the water. Also called blue swelling.

drop-table (drōp'tā'bl), n. A machine for lowering weights, and especially for removing the wheels of locomotives.

drop-the-handkerchief (drōp'the'hang'ker-chif), n. A children's game in which one player having a handkerchief drops it behind any one of the others, who are formed in a ring, and tries to escape within the ring before being kissed.

drop-tin (drōp'tin), n. Tin pulverized by being dropped into water while melted.

dropwise (drōp'wīz), adv. [< drop + -wise]. After the manner of drops; dropingly; by drops. [Rare.]

In mine own lady palms I call'd the spring That gather'd trickling dropwise from the left.

Tennyson, Merlin and Vivien.

drop-worm (drōp'wérn), n. The larva of one of many insects. Specifically—(a) Of any geometrid moth. Also called spun-worm, inch-worm, meadow-worm, etc. (b) Of Thyridopteryx ephemeraformis. Also called hang-worm and bag-worm.

dropwort (drōp'wért), n. An English name for the Spiraea Filipendula.—False dropwort, an American book-name for Tiedemannia bracteolata, an umbelliferous plant of the Atlantic States.—Hemlock and water-dropwort, common book-names for species of Oxycnema.

droshka, n. Same as droshky.

drose, c. l. See droser.

Drosera (drōs'ér-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. δροσέρω, dewy, < δρόσος, dew, water, juice, prob. ult. < (Skt.) √ dru, run.] A genus of plants giving name to the order Droseraceae. There are about 100 species, found in all parts of the globe excepting the druclet, drucy, n. Same as drug.

drug¹ (drug), n. [Early mod. E. also drugg, druggie (M.E. drugges, drugges, is doubtful in this sense, as in the only passage cited (Chaucer) it alternates with draggis, stomachic con-fite: see *dredge*²); = G. droge, drogus = Sp. Pg. droga, < OF. drogue, F. drogue, a drug, mod. also stuff, rubbish, < D. droog = E. dry: "drooghe waere, droogh kruyd, drooghervye (dry waste, dry herb, 'druggery'), pharmacon, aroma-mata" (Kilian, who explains that "drugs violently dry up and cleanse the body, but afford it no nourishment"); "droogen, gedroogde kruyden en wortels (dried herbs and roots), druggs" (Howell). See dry.] 1. Any vegetable, animal, or mineral substance used in the composition or preparation of medicines; hence, also, any ingredient used in chemical preparations employed in the arts.

Full redy hadde he his apotecaries,
To med his drugges (var. drugges, drugges) and his letusries.

For eche of hem made other for to winne.

Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 426.

2. A thing which has lost its value, and is no longer wanted; especially a commodity that is not salable, especially from overproduction; as, a drug in the market (the phrase in which the word is generally used).

Lead they lie,
As these were times when loyalty is a drug,
And need to a subordinate too cheap
And common to be served when we spend life.

Browning, Ring and Book, II. 250.

drug² (drug), v.; pret. and pp. drugged, ppr. drugging. [*< drug*¹, v.] 1. To mix with drugs; narcotize or make poisonous, as a beverage, by mixture with a drug; as, to drug wine (in order to render the person who drinks it insensible).

drugget (drug'et), n. [cf. droguet = Sp. Pg. droguete = It. droghetto, < F. droguet, drugget, formerly a kind of stuff half silk, half wool. Origin unknown. There is nothing to show a connection with *drug*¹.] 1. A coarse woven material, felted or woven, either of one color or printed on one side, and used as a protection for a carpet, as a carpet-lining, or, especially in summer, as a rug or carpet, generally covering only the middle portion of a floor. A finer fabric of the same sort is used for table- and piano-covers.—2. A striped woolen or woolen and cotton fabric, commonly twilled, formerly used in some parts of Great Britain, especially for women's clothing.

He is of a fair complexion, light brown bank hair, having long on a dark brown horse coat double breasted on each side, with black buttons and buttonholes, a light drugget waistcoat.

Advertisement, 1703 (Malcolm's Manners and Customs of London in 18th Cent.)

They [the Gauls] wore their stuffs for summer, and rough felts or druggets for winter wear, which are said to have been prepared with vinegar, and to have been so tough as to resist the stroke of a sword.

C. Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 114.

druggist (drug'ist), n. [= MD. drooghst = F. droguiste (appar. later than the F.); = *drug*¹ + -ist.] 1. One who deals in drugs; one whose occupation is the buying and selling of drugs.

This new corporation of druggists had influenced the bills of mortality and purged the College of Physicians with diseases for which they neither knew a name or cure.

Tatler, No. 121.

Smith, Works, I. 10.

druid (drö'id), n. [= G. druide = F. druide = Sp. Pg. druida = It. druido, < L. druida, pl.

druidæ, also druids (fam. druidas), pl. druides (usually in pl.), = Gr. druidæ, a druid; of Old Celtic origin: < Olr. drui, gen. druid, dat. and acc. druid, nom. pl. and dual druid, later Ir. and Gael. druid, gen. druidh, a magician (L. magus); also later nom. druidh = W. derwydd (orig. nom.
"dryer"), a druid. (Cf. AS. dry, a magician, < Olr. drui, a magician. The W. form shows a forced simulation of W. derw, an oak; so L. druida was thought to be connected with Gr. dry, a tree, esp. an oak (= E. oak); but this is guesswork. (Cf.
Olr. dair (gen. durach), dair (gen. duro, daro) = OGael. dair = W. dâr, an oak.) 1. One of an order of priests or ministers of religion among the ancient Celts of Gaul, Britain, and Ireland.
The chief seats of the druids were in Wales, Brittany, and the regions around the modern Breux and Chartres in France. The druids are believed to have possessed some knowledge of geometry, natural philosophy, etc. They superintended the affairs of religion and morality, and performed the office of judges. The oak is said to have represented to them the one supreme god, and the mis-tles when growing upon it the dependence of man upon him; and they accordingly held these in the highest veneration, oak groves being their places of worship. They are said to have had a common superior, who was elected by a majority of votes from their own members, and who enjoyed his dignity for life. The druids, as an order, always opposed the Romans, but were ultimately exterminated by them. (Very commonly written with a capital.)

As those Druids taught, which kept the British rites, And dwell in darksome groves, there counselling with spirits.

Drayton, Polyolbion, l. 35.

This Religion was governed by a sort of Priests or Magicians called Druides from the Greek name of an Oak, which Tree they had in greatest reverence, and the Mistletoe especially growing thereon.

Milton, Hist. Eng., II.

2. [cap.] A member of a society called the United Ancient Order of Druids, founded in London in 1781, for the mutual benefit of the members, and now counting numerous lodges, called groves, in America, Australia, Germany, etc.—3. In entom., a kind of saw-fly, a hyme-nopterous insect of the family Tenthredinidae.— Druid's foot, a five-pointed figure supposed to have had mystical meaning among the druids, and still in use in some parts of Europe as a charm.

druidess (drö'id-ess), n. [= F. druidesse; = druid + -ess.] A female druid; a druidic prophetess or sorceress.

The Druidess has offended Heaven in giving way to love.

The American, IV. 202.

druidic, druidical (drö'id'ik, -i-kal), a. [< druid
+ -ic, -ical.] Of or pertaining to the druids;
as, druidical remains.

The Druid followed him, and suddenly we are told, struck him with a druidic wand, or, according to one version, stung at him a tuft of grass over which he had pronounced a druidical incantation. O'Curry, Anc. Irish, I. 2.

Druidical bead. Name as adder-stone.—Druidical circles, the name popularly given to circles formed of large upright stones, consisting in some cases of a single round, in others of several rounds, and concentric, from the assumption that they were druidical places of worship, though there is no sufficient proof that this was their designation. The most celebrated druidical circle in England is that at Stonehenge in Wiltshire. Druidical patera, a name given to bowls, commonly of stone, and usually with one handle, found in the Isle of Man and elsewhere, and now thought to have been used as incense burners. Similar bowls are still in use for this purpose in the Faroe Islands.

druidish (drö'id-ish), a. [< druid + -ish.] Pertaining to or like the druids.

druidism (drö'id-izm), n. [= F. druidisme = Sp.
Pg. druidismo; = druid + -ism.] The religion of the druids; the doctrines, rites, and ceremonies of the sacerdotal caste of the ancient Celts. See druid, 1.

Still the great and capital objects of their [the Saxons'] worship were taken from Druidism.

Burke, Abridg. of Eng. Hist., I. 2.

Their religion [that of the ancient Britons] was Druid-ism, and Britain is said to have been the parent-seat of that creed.

Sir E. Creasy, Eng. Count., p. 22.

druid-stone (drö'id-stón), n. Same as gray-wither.

drum¹ (drum), n. [Early mod. E. also drumme; = Dan. troume = Sw. trumma (cf. Ir. Gael. druma, < E.), a drum, < D. trum = Lat. trumma = G. troume, dial. trumme, trum, troume, troum, late M.H.G. trumme, trumbe, drombe, drumme, trum, a drum (also in dial. form: Dan. troume = Sw. trumla, < D. troumel = G. troumel, formerly also drummel, M.H.G. trummel, trumpe, drumpe, trumel, a drum); orig. identical with M.H.G. trumme, trumbe, < OHG. trumba, trumpa, a trumpet, trumpet; see *trump*¹ and trump-pet. It thus appears that *drum*¹ and *trump*¹ are ult. identical, though applied to unlike instruments. The diverse use is prob. due to the (supposed) imitative origin of the name. See *drum*¹, v.] 1. A musical instrument of the per-cussive class, consisting of a hollow wooden or metallic body and a tightly stretched head of membrane which is struck with a stick. Three principal forms are used: (1) cylindrical, with one head and an open bottom, usually called a tambourine or Egyptian drum; (2) hemispherical, with one head, usually called a kettledrum; (3) cylindrical, with two heads, one of which can be struck, as in a side-drum or snare-drum, or both of which can be struck, as in the bass drum. All these forms are used to some extent in orchestral music, but the kettledrum only is important, because it alone can be perfectly tuned. Orchestral drums are generally used in pairs, and tuned to different pitches. The third form in all its varieties is much used in military music, principally to emphasize rhythm.

I would wish them rather to be chosen out of all parties of the realm, either by discretion of wise men thereunto appointed, or by lot, or by the drum, as was the old use in sending forth of colonies.

Spenser, State of Ireland.

The drummer cri'd a dub. Macquay, Flowers.

Your nother party fire must,

Then beat a flying drum

Battle of Philisburgh (Child's Ballads, VII. 134).

2. In arch.: (a) The solid part of the Corinthian and Composite capital, otherwise called bell vase, or basket. (b) One of the blocks of nearly cylindrical form of which the shafts of many columns are constructed. (c) An upright member under or above a dome.—3. In mach., a term applied to various contrivances resembling a drum in shape. Specifically: (a) A cylinder revolving on an axis for the purpose of turning wheels by means of belts or bands passing round it. (b) The barrel of a crane or windlass. (c) A cylinder on which wire is wound, as in wire-drawing. (d) The grinding cylinder or cone of some mills. (e) The cast-iron case which holds the coiled spring of a spring car-brake. (f) A circular radiator for steam or hot air; a stove drum or steam-drum. (g) In water-heaters or steam-boilers, a chamber into which heated water is made to flow in order to afford room for other bodies of water from parts of the boiler not so near the fire. (h) A steam-tight cask in which printed fabrics are submitted to the action of steam to fix the colors. (i) A washing tub for cleaning rags in paper-making. (j) A doffer in a carding machine.

4. In a vase or similar vessel, that part of the body which approximates to a cylindrical form.—5. In anat. and zool.: (a) The tympanum or middle ear. (b) The tracheal tympanum or labyrinth of a bird. See tympanum, 4. (c) One of the tympanic organs seated in two deep cavities on the first abdominal segment of certain Homoptera, and said to be used in producing sounds. Kirby. (d) The large hollow hyoid bone of a howling monkey. See Myctina.—6. A membrane drawn over a round frame, used for testing the delicate edges of eye-instruments.—7. A receptacle having the form of a drum, or the quantity packed in such receptacle; as, a drum of figs.—8. Milit., a party accompanied by a drum sent under a flag of truce to confer with the enemy.

I believe I told you of Lord John Drummond sending a drum to Wade to propose a cartel.

Walspole, Letters, II. 2.

9. [With allusion to drumming up recruits.] A fashionable and crowded evening party, at which card-playing appears to have been the chief attraction; a rout. The more riotous of such assemblies were styled drum-majors.

They were all three to go together to the opera, and thence to Lady Thomas Hatchet's drum.

Felding, Tom Jones

All your modern entertainments, routs, drums, or assemblies.

Goldsmith, The Goddess of Silence.

10. An afternoon tea. Also called kettledrum, with a punning allusion to tea-kettle.—11. In ichth., a name of several sciaenoid fishes; so called from the drumming noise they make, said to be due, in part at least, to the grinding of the pharyngeal bones upon each other. (a) The salt water drum, Pogonias cromis, the largest of the Sciaenidae, ranging from 20 to nearly 100 pounds in weight.

of a silvery-gray color when adult, and with numerous barbels along the chin. It ranges along the Atlantic coast of the United States from Florida to Massachusetts. It feeds much upon shell fish, and is very destructive to oyster beds. (b) The fresh water drum, Hoplosternus grunniens, a smaller fish than the foregoing, without barbels. It is an inhabitant of the great lakes, and of the Mississippi river and its larger tributaries. Also called sheepshead. (c) The branded drum, or headless drum, Sciaenops ocellatus, the redfish of the south Atlantic and Gulf States. It is recognized by the black spot margined with light color forming an ocellus on each side of the base of the tail-fin. It is a game-fish valued for the table, averaging about 10 pounds in weight, but sometimes attaining upward of 20 pounds. Also called orgas, fish, red-horse, spotted-bass.

red-bass, sea-bass. See cut under redfish.—Bass drum, a musical instrument, the largest of the drum family, having a cylindrical body and two heads of membrane, the tension of which may be altered by hoops. It is struck with a soft-headed stick. It is commonly used in military bands, and occasionally in full orchestras. Formerly called long drum.—Beat or tuck of drum. See beat.—Circulating drum, in water-heaters or steam-boilers, a chamber disposed to receive a flow of heated water in order to afford room near the heating surface for other bodies of water from parts of the boiler remote from the fire. Double drum, a former name of the bass drum.—Drum of cod, a large cask or hoghead, containing from 500 to 1,000 pounds, into which the cod are packed tightly and pressed down with a jack-screw and shipped.—Drum of the ear. Same as tympanum.—Muffled drum, a drum having the cord which is used for carrying the drum over the shoulder passed twice through the cords which cross the lower diameter of the drum, to prevent a sharp sound, or to render the sound grave and solemn.

And our hearts, though stout and brave,
Still, like muffled drums, are beating Funeral marches to the grave.

Longfellow, Psalm of Life.

drum¹ (drum), v.; pret. and pp. drummed, ppr. drumming. [= D. trommen = Dan. trømme = Sw. trumma, drum; also freq. E. drumble, q. v.; from the noun, but felt to be in part imitative. See drum, n., and cf. thrum.] I. intrans. 1. To beat a drum; beat or play a tune on a drum.—2. To beat rhythmically or regularly with the fingers or something else, as if using drumsticks; as, to drum on the table.

He drummed upon his desk with his ruler and meditated.
W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 274

There was no sound but the drumming of the General's fingers on his sword hilt.
G. W. Cable, Old Creole Days, p. 281

3. To beat, as the heart; throb.

His drumming heart cheers up his burning eye,
His eye commends the leading to his hand
Shak., Lucio, I. 435.

4. To attract recruits, as by the sound of the drum; hence, in the United States, to sue for partisans, customers, etc.; followed by for.—5. To sound like a drum; resound.

This indeed makes a noise, and drums in popular ears.
Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici.

6. To produce a sound resembling drumming; said of partridges, blackcock, and other birds. It is done by quivering the expanded feathers of the wings.

The bird (snipe) never drummed except when on the stoop, and whenever it performed this manoeuvre the quill feathers of the wings were always expanded to their utmost width, so that the light could be seen between them, and quivered with a rapid, tremulous motion that quite blurred their outlines.
J. G. Wood, Out of Doors, p. 171.

II. trans. 1. To perform on a drum, as a tune.—2. Milit., to expel formally and accompany in departure with the beat of the drum: often used figuratively, and usually followed by out; as, the disgraced soldier was drummed out of the regiment.

A soldier proved unworthy was drummed out Lowell, Tempora Mutantur.

One by one the chief actors in it [the prosecution of the Whisky Ring] were called before the lines, despoiled of their insignia, and drummed out of the administration camp.
N. A. Rev., CXIII. 321.

3. To summon as by beat of drum.

But, to confound such tune,
That drums him from his sport, and speaks as loud
As his own state, and ours—'tis to be child
As we rate boys.
Shak., A. and C. I. 1.

4. To force upon the attention by continual iteration; din; as, to drum something into one's ears. To drum up, to assemble as by beat of drum; assemble or collect by influence and exertion; as, to drum up recruits or customers.

drum² (drum), n. [Ir. and Gael. drum, also druman, the back, a ridge, summit.] 1. A ridge; a hill. Drum enters into the composition of many Celtic place-names, especially in Ireland and Scotland, as Drumcondra, Drumglass, Drumshough, Drumlanig, Drumuck; and it is frequently found alone as the name of a farm, an estate, a village, etc. Specifically—2. A long narrow ridge or mound of sand, gravel, and boulders: a name given by Irish geologists to elevations of this kind believed to have been the result of glacial agencies. See esker, horseback, and kame. Also called drumlin.

It [the glacial drift] is apt to occur in long ridges ("drums" or "drumlines") which run in the general direction of the rock strata—that is, in the path of the ice movement.
Gibbs.

The long parallel ridges, or "eskerbacks" and drums, as they are termed, . . . invariably coincide in direction with the valleys or straths in which they lie.
Gibbs, Ice Age, p. 17.

drum-armature (drum'ar'ma-jūr), n. A dynamo-armature constructed so as to resemble a drum in form.

drumbelo (drum'be-lō), n. [E. dial.: see drum-bled, v.] A dull, heavy fellow.

drumble¹ (drum'bl), v. t. [Appar. freq. of drum, v., after D. trummeln = G. trummeln = Dan. trømle = Sw. trumla, drum (see drum, v.); but perhaps in part of other origin. Cf. drum-bled.] 1. To sound like a drum.

The whistling pipe and drumming taber.

Drayton, Nymphidia, viii.

2. To mumble. Hallivell.

drumble² (drum'bl), v. t. [Cf. drumble¹ and dumble¹.] To drone; be sluggish.

Go take up those clothes here, quickly; . . . look, how you drumble.
Shak., M. W. of W., III. 2.

drumble-drone (drum'bl-drōn), n. [E. dial. also drumble-drane; < drumble + drone; cf. drum-bledore.] 1. A drone.—2. A humblybee.—3. A dor-beetle. Kingsley.

drumblert (drum'blər), n. [MD. drommelter, a kind of ship (Kilian). Cf. MD. D. drommelter, a man of square and compact build, < drommel, things packed close together, < drom, a thread, = E. thrum, q. v.] A kind of ship.

She was immediately assaulted by divers English phrases, hoys, and drumblers.
Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 601.

drum-call (drum'kal), n. In milit. music, a call, signal, or command given upon the drum.

drum-curb (drum'kərb), n. A wooden or iron cylinder set in the opening of a shaft, at the beginning of its construction, to sustain the lining. The earth is cut away under the edges of the drum, and as it settles down courses of brick are added to the lining at the top.

drum-cylinder (drum'sil'in-dēr), n. In a printing press, a large cylinder making one revolution to each impression. See cylinder-press.

drumfish (drum'fish), n. Same as drum, 11.

drum-guard (drum'gärd), n. A device on a threshing-machine to prevent the operator, while feeding it, from falling into the throat, the feeder being at the top: used only on English machines.

drumhead (drum'hed), n. 1. The membrane stretched upon a drum, by striking which the tone is produced. Its tension and the pitch of the tone are determined by rings or hoops fitted round the edge of the drum body.

2. The top part of a capstan, which is pierced with a number of holes to receive the ends of the levers or bars employed to turn it round. See capstan.—3. In anat., the membrana tympani.—4. A variety of cabbage having a large rounded or flattened head.—Drumhead court martial. See court martial, under court.

drumlin (drum'lin), n. [Cf. Drum (mound) (see def.) + -in, -ine.] An alkaloid from Euphorbia Drummondii, said to produce local anesthesia like cocaine.

drumlin (drum'lin), n. Same as drum, 2.
drumly (drum'li), a. [E. dial. and Sc., also drumled. Cf. drumly.] Perhaps altered from equiv. ME. drubly, drobly, turbid, muddy, connected with drubben, drobben, trouble, make turbid, as water, perhaps allied to equiv. droven (see droit), or possibly a mixture of droven with equiv. trubben, trobben, trouble. Cf. drum-bled, and 14. drummetig, drummetig, musty, applied to grain, bread, etc.] 1. Turbid; full of grounds, dregs, or sediment; dreggy; muddy; holding foreign matter in mechanical solution.

Draw me some water out of this spring. Madam, it is all foul. . . . It is all drumly, black, muddy.
Woodspeck, Fr. and Eng. Gram., p. 210.

Then bows drumly German water,
To mark himself look fair and fatter.
Burns, The Two Dogs.

2. Troubled; gloomy.

Dismal grew his countenance,
And drumly grew his ee.
The Daemon Lover (Child's Ballads, I. 208).

drum-major (drum'mā'jor), n. 1. The chief or first drummer of a regiment.—2. One who directs the evolutions of a band or drum-corps in marching. [U. S.]—3. A riotous evening assembly. See drum, 9.

drummer (drum'ēr), n. 1. One who plays the drum; especially, one who beats time on the drum for military exercises and marching.

We carried with us a fife & a drummer.
Hakluyt's Voyages, III. 427.

2. One who solicits custom; a traveling salesman; a commercial traveler. [U. S.]

The energy and wiles of business drummers.
The Century, XXVIII. 421.

3. A local name of a large West Indian cockroach, Blattia piganon, which, in old frame houses, makes a noise at night, by knocking Druse² (drüz), n. [Turk. Drusi.] One of a people and religious sect of Syria, living chiefly in the mountain regions of Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon and the district of Hauran. The only name they acknowledge is Antariyah (Muhammad); that by which they are known to others is probably from Ismail (Ismail or Ismail), who was their first apostle in Syria. They are fanatical and warlike, and have had bloody conflicts with their neighbors the Maronites.

Drusian¹ (drü'zi-an), n. [L. Drusianus, C. Drusianus (see def.).] Pertaining to Nero Claudius Drusus, called Drusus Senior (38-9 B. C.), stepson of the emperor Augustus, who governed Germany. — Drusian foot, an ancient German long measure, equal to about 13 English inches.

Drusian² (drü'zi-an), n. [C. Druse + -ian.] Of or pertaining to the Druses.

The full exposition of the Drusian creed . . . would require a volume of considerable size.

Encyc. Brit., VII. 484.

drusy (drü'zi), a. [C. druse + -y.] In mineralogy, covered or lined with very minute crystals. The surface of a mineral is said to be drusy when composed of very small prominent crystals of nearly uniform size, as drusy quartz.

The drusy, crystalline cavities of quartz and amethyst that enhance the beauty of the mineral (falcated wood) so much.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 262.

druse, n. [See drusy.] A muddy river. Grove. [Cumberland, Eng.]

drusy, a. See drusy. Brckett.

drusy, druxey (drük'si), a. [Also draxy, and formerly draxy, drickie; origin obscure.] Partly decayed, as a tree or timber; having decayed spots or streaks of a whitish color.

dry (dri), a. and n. [Early mod. E. also drie; C. ME. drye, drie, dri, drige, dryge, drye, etc.; AS. dryga, dryge, orig. "drüge" = D. droog = Mlat. droge, dryge, LAt. droge, drag, drege, dree, dry; allied to OE. drokno, drokno, adv. druknan, v. make dry, = OHG. truchen, trochan, MHG. trucken, trocken, G. trocken, adj. dry. Cf. Jeel. draugr, a dry log, from the same Teut. √ "drup". Hence ult. drought, dronth, dryth, and drug.] I. a.; compar. drier, superl. driest (sometimes dryer and dryest). 1. Without moisture; not moist; absolutely or comparatively free from water or wetness, or from fluid of any kind; as, dry land; dry clothes; dry weather; a dry day; dry wood; dry bones.

When 'tis fair and dry Weather North of the Equator, 'tis blustering and rainy Weather South of it.

Dampier, Voyages, II. 111. 77.

It is a very dry country, where they have hardly any other supply but from the rain water.

Poore's Description of the East, II. 11. 136.

Upon the reading of this letter, there was not a dry eye in the club.

Addison, Spectator, No. 617.

Nor vainly buys what (Hill) sells,

Poetic buckets for dry wells.

M. Green, The Spoken.

1. Specifically—2. In geol. and mining, free from the presence or use of water, or distant from water; as, dry diggings; dry separation.—3. Not giving milk; as, a dry cow.—4. Thirsty; craving drink, especially intoxicating drink.

None so dry or thirsty . . . will touch one drop of it.

Shak., T. of the S. v. 2.

Believe me, I am dry with talking; here, boy, give us here a bottle and a glass.

Cotton, In Walton's Angler, II. 350.

I suspected nothing but that he had rode till he was dry.

Watkins, Letters, II. 245.

5. Barron; jejune; destitute of interest; incapable of awakening emotion; as, a dry style; a dry subject; a dry discussion.

As one that in a dream, whose drier brain is lost with troubled sights and fancies wake, He mumbled soft, but would not all his silence break.

Spenser, F. Q., I. 1. 47.

Their discourses from the pulpit are generally dry, methodical, and uninteresting.

Goldsmith, English Clergy.

Long before he reached manhood he knew how to baffle curiosity by dry and guarded answers.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., VII.

Macaulay's memory, like Nichols', undoubtedly confounded not infrequently inference and fact. It exaggerated; it gave, not what was in the book, but what a vivid imagination inferred from the book. Sir George Lewis had none of this defect; his memory was a dry memory, just as his mind was a dry light; if he said a thing was at page 10, you might be sure it was at page 10.

W. Baynes, On Sir G. C. Lewis.

6. Severe; hard; as, a dry blow.

Dr. S. I pray you eat none of it [meat].

Ant. S. Your reason?

Dr. S. Let it make you choleric, and purchase me another dry beating.

Shak., C. of E. II. 2.

If I should have said no, I should have given him the lie, uncle, and so have deserved a dry beating again.

Ford, The Fiv., II. 4.

7. Lacking in cordiality; cold; as, his answer was very short and dry.

With sterner cheer than he stood, he stroked his berde, & with a countenance dry as he drag down his cote.

Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), I. 385.

Full cold my greeting was and dry.

Tennyson, The Letters.

8. Humorous or sarcastic, apparently without intention; shrewdly witty or caustic; as, a dry remark or repartee.

He was rather a dry, shrewd kind of body.

Irving.

Mark . . . is exceedingly calm; his smile is shrewd; he can say the driest, most cutting things in the quietest tones.

Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, ix.

9. In painting, noting a hardness or formal stiffness of outline, or a want of mellowness and harmony in color; frigidly precise; harsh.

The Fall of the Angels, by F. Floris, 1554; which has some good parts, but without massiveness and dry.

Sir J. Reynolds, Journey to Flanders and Holland.

No comparison can be instituted between his [Verrocchio's] dry unadorned manner and the divine style of his scholar [Leonardo da Vinci].

C. C. Perkins, Italian Sculpture, p. 122.

10. In sculp., lacking or void of luxuriousness or tenderness in form.—11. Free from sweetness and fruity flavor; said of wines and, by extension, of brandy and the like. It is said also of artificially prepared wines, as champagnes, in which a diminished amount of sweetening, or liquor, as it is called, is added, as compared with sweet wines.

12. In metal., noting a peculiar condition of a metal undergoing metallurgical treatment. The epithet is chiefly used in reference to copper which is being refined. Dry copper contains a certain proportion of oxygen in combination, and to eliminate this it is subjected to the process of poling.

During the poling the refiner takes an assay at short intervals, as the metal is liable to get out of pitch, or become dry, as under poled copper is termed.

Encyc. Brit., VI. 350.

13. In American political slang, of or belonging to the Prohibition party; in favor of or adopting prohibition of the sale or use of intoxicating liquors; opposed to wet; as, a dry town, county, or State. Cut and dry, see cut, p. 1. Dry bob, casting, color. See the nouns. Dry confections. See confection. Dry cooper. See cooper.

Dry cupping. See cupping, 1. Dry digging, distillation, exchange, mass, measure, pile, etc. See the nouns. Dry plate, in photog., a sensitized plate of which the sensitive film is hard and dry, so that it can be packed away, and, if protected from light, will keep for a considerable time before being used to make a negative or a positive picture. Various processes for preparing dry plates have been experimented with almost since the earliest diffusion of photography; but most of these processes afforded plates of very uncertain quality, slow in operation, and exceedingly unreliable in their property of keeping. Dry plates have comparatively recently come into general use, in great measure superseding the old wet plates, owing to the adoption of gelatin as a medium for the sensitizing agent (bromide of silver), which is formed into an emulsion with the gelatin, and spread in a thin film upon some support, as glass, paper, or metal. Such plates require a remarkably short exposure to make a picture, are very convenient to handle, since the operator can make a number of exposures at one time and place, and can perform the chemical operations of development, etc., at his convenience, weeks afterwards, if necessary, at any other place, instead of being forced, as with wet plates, to finish his picture at once. Moreover, the gelatin film is so tough that it is hardly necessary to varnish a dry-plate picture, as is indispensable with the tender collodion film, and these plates can be prepared commercially at small cost and of even quality. Their chief defect is that they cannot, as now made, be trusted to keep unimpaired in warm, damp weather, while unexposed or undeveloped, unless carefully protected from the air (in air-tight boxes).—Dry process. See process.—Dry season, a fishing season during which fish are scarce. [Local, New England.] Dry service. See dry, under man.

Dry way, a method of assaying by the aid of fire, or in a furnace or muffle: the opposite of assaying in the humid way, when the combination to be assayed, or, more properly analyzed, exists in solution, or in the liquid form.—High and dry. See high.—To boll dry. See boll.

II. n.; pl. dries (drix). 1. A place where things are dried; a drying-house.

In the tanks [clay] is allowed to settle until it acquires a thick creamy consistency, when it is transferred to the drying-house or dry.

Encyc. Brit., XIV. 1.

2. In American political slang, a member of the Prohibition party.—3. In masonry, a fissure in a stone, intersecting it at various angles to its bed and rendering it unfit to support a load.

dry (dri), v.; pret. and pp. dried, ppr. drying. [C. ME. dryen, drien, drygen, drygen, etc.; AS. dryga, drigan, tr., dry, drigan, intr., become dry (= D. drogen = LAt. drigen, drygen, dry). C. dryge, dry; see dry, a.] I. trans. 1. To make dry; free from water or from moisture of any kind, and by any means, as by wiping, evaporation, exhalation, or drainage; desiccate; as, to dry the eyes; to dry hay; wind dries the earth; to dry a meadow or a swamp.

After drie him in the sonne, a nyghtes
Leve him not throuthe, and then in places colde Lette him be uppe.

Palsgrave, Huzboudrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 117.

With eyes scarce dried, the sorrowing dame
To welcome noble Marmion came.

Scott, Marmion, IV. 12.

2. To cause to evaporate or exhale; stop the flow of; as, to dry out the water from a wet garment.

Chang'd Peace and Pow'r for Rage and War,
Only to dry one Widow's Tears.

Prior, Alma, I.

3. To wither; parch.

A man of God, by Faith, first strangely dried,
Then heal'd again, that Kings vnholy had.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Triumph of Faith, III. 2.

This wasted body,
Beaten and bruised with arms, dried up with troubles,
Is good for nothing else but quiet now, air,
And holy prayers.

Fletcher, Loyal Subject, I. 2.

Cut and dried. See cut, p. 1. — Dried alum. Same as brent alum (which see, under alum). — To dry up. (a) To deprive wholly of moisture; scorch or parch with aridity.

Their honourable men are famished, and their multitude dried up with thirst.

Isa., v. 13.

(b) To evaporate completely; stop the flow of; as, the fierce heat dried up all the streams.

Dry up your tears, and stick your rosemary
On this fair corpse.

Shak., R. and J., IV. 5.

II. intrans. 1. To lose moisture; become free from moisture.—2. To evaporate; be exhaled; lose fluidity; as, water dries away rapidly; blood dries quickly on exposure to the air. — To dry up. (a) To become thoroughly dry; lose all moisture. (b) To be wholly evaporated; cease to flow. (c) To wither, as a limb. (d) To cease talking; be silent. [Low.]

Dry up!—no, I won't dry up. I'll have my rights, if I die for 'em, . . . so you had better dry up yourself.

P. Reeves, Student's Speaker, p. 79.

dryad (dri'ad), n. [= D. G. Dan. dryade = Sw. dryad = F. dryade = Sp. driade, driada = Pg. dryas = It. driada, driade, < L. dryas (dryad-), < Gr. δρύς (dryas-), a wood-nymph, < δρύς, a tree, esp. and commonly the oak, = E. tree, q. v. Cf. hamadryad.] 1. In myth., a deity or nymph of the woods; a nymph supposed to reside in trees or preside over woods. See hamadryad.

Soft she withdrew, and, like a wood-nymph light, Orad or Dryad, out of Delia's train,
Betook her to the groves.

Milton, P. L., IX. 387.

Then, light-winged Dryad of the trees, . . .

Singest of summer in full-throated ease.

Keats, Ode to a Nightingale.

Knock at the rough rind of this flex tree, and summon forth the Dryad.

Hawthorne, Marble Faun, IX.

2. In zool., a kind of dormouse, Myoxus dryas. Dryades (dri'ad-ēz), n. pl. [NL.] A group of butterflies, named from the genus Dryas. Hübner, 1816.

dryadic (dri-ad'ik), a. [C. dryad + -ic.] Of or pertaining to dryads.

He could hear the woods declaiming in vibrant periods, although he could translate none of these dryadic tones that came from the trees.

The Atlantic, LXI. 569.

Dryandra (dri-an'dri), n. [NL., named after Jonas Dryander, a Swedish-English botanist (1748-1810).] A large genus of Australian shrubs, natural order Proteaceae, with hard, dry, evergreen, generally serrated leaves, and compact cylindrical clusters of yellow flowers. A few species are occasionally cultivated in green-houses.

Dryas (dri'as), n. [NL., < L. dryas, a dryad; see dryad.] 1. A small genus of rosaceous plants, found in alpine and arctic regions of the northern hemisphere. They are small prostrate shrubs with large white or yellow flowers, followed by a number of long feather-awned achenes. The mountain avens, D. octopetala, is simple, and from it the arctic D. integrifolia is hardly distinct. The only other species, D. Drummondii, is peculiar to the Rocky Mountains of British America.

2. In entom.: (a) A genus of butterflies, of which D. paphia is the type and sole species. (b) Another genus of butterflies. Also called Acuthus. Hübner, 1816; Felder, 1865.

dry-as-dust (dri'as-dnst'), a. and n. [That is, dry as dust; used as the name of "Dr. Dryas-dust," the feigned editor or introducer of some of Scott's novels, and by later writers in allusion to this character.] 1. a. Very dry or uninteresting; prosaic.

That sense of large human power which the mastery over a great ancient language, itself the key to a magnificent literature, gave, and which made scholarship then a passion, while with us it has almost relapsed into an antiquarian dry-as-dust pursuit.

R. H. Hutton, Modern Guides of English Thought, p. 195.

So much of the work is really admirable that one the more regrets the large proportion of the trivial and the dry-as-dust.

Athenaeum, No. 5966, p. 720.

II. n. A dull, dry, prosaic person.

Not a mere antiquarian dry-as-dust.
British Quarterly Rev., LXXXIII. 172.

dry-beat (dri'bēt), v. t. To beat (a thing) till it becomes dry; hence, to beat severely.

I will dry-beat you with an iron wit.

Shak., R. and J., iv. 5.

See. Not one word more, my maids! break off, break off. Break. By heaven, all dry-beaten with pure scorn!

Shak., I. L. L., v. 2.

He by dry-beating him might make him at least sensible of blows.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), i. 334.

dry-bone (dri'bōn), n. In mining, the ore of zinc, chiefly the silicate, which occurs, mixed with lead ore, in the mines of the upper Mississippi lead region.

dry-boned (dri'bōnd), a. Having dry bones; without flesh. Imp. Diet.

dry-caster (dri'kās'tor), n. A species of beaver. Sometimes called parchment-beaver.

dry-cupping (dri'kup'ing), n. See cupping.

dry-cure (dri'kūr), v. t. To cure (fish, meat, hides, etc.) by salting and drying, as distinguished from pickling.

dry-ditch (dri'dich), v. t. To labor at without result, as one who digs a ditch in which no water will flow.

There would be no end to repeat with how many quarrels this unfortunate Bishop was provoked, yet his adventures did but dry-ditch their matters and digged in vain, though they still cast up earth.

By. Hackett, Abp. Williams, ii. 98.

dry-dock (dri'dok), n. See dock.

dryer, n. See drier.

dry-eyed (dri'id), a. Tearless; not weeping.

Sight so deform what heart of rock could long

Dry-eyed behold?

Milton, P. L., vi. 405.

dry-fat (dri'fat), n. Same as dry-fat.

dry-fat (dri'fat), n. A niggardly person. Ford.

dryfoot (dri'fut), adv. [ME. drye foot, dru fot, dru fot, drye fot, adverbial acc.; AS. dat. pl. drygum fotum, on dry feet.] 1. With dry feet; on dry land.—2. In the manner of a dog which pursues game by the scent of the foot.

A hound that runs counter, and yet draws dry foot well.

Shak., C. of L., iv. 2.

My old master intends to follow my young master, dry-foot, over Moorfields to London.

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, ii. 2.

dry-foundered (dri'foun'derd), a. Foundered, as a horse.

If he kick thus I the dog-days, he will be dry-foundered.

Beau. and Fl., King and No King, v. 3.

dry-goods (dri'gudz), n. pl. Textile fabrics, and related or analogous articles of trade (as cloth, shawls, blankets, ribbons, thread, yarn, hosiery, etc.), in distinction from groceries, hardware, etc.

112 horses were laden on the beach near Boston with dry goods, . . . and on the 20th of the same month 40 horses were laden with dry goods at Kirtley by rivers well armed. Rep. of House of Commons on Commerce, 1775.

dry-house (dri'hous), n. Same as drying house.

To have wooden bottles retain their size and shape after they are put into a hot mill, the wood must be thoroughly seasoned in a good, well heated dry house.

Manufacturers' Rev., xx. 217.

drying (dri'ing), a. [Pr. of dry. v.] 1. Serving to dry; adapted to exhaust moisture; as, a drying wind or day.—2. Having the quality of rapidly becoming dry and hard; as, a drying oil. See oil.

drying-box (dri'ing-boks), n. In photog., an oven or a cupboard heated by a gas- or oil-stove, or otherwise, and used to dry and harden gelatin plates, phototypes, etc.

drying-case (dri'ing-kās), n. A copper case inclosed in a hot-water chamber, employed in drying tissues and hardening balsam preparations for the microscope.

drying-chamber (dri'ing-chām'ber), n. See chamber.

drying-floor (dri'ing-flōr), n. See floor.

drying-house (dri'ing-hous), n. A building, room, etc., in establishments of many different kinds, as gunpowder-works, dye-houses, fruit-drying establishments, etc., where goods or materials are dried in an artificially raised temperature; a drying-chamber. Also dry-house, drying-room.

drying-machine (dri'ing-mā-shēn'), n. A machine used in bleaching, dyeing, and laundry establishments, consisting of two concentric drums or cylinders, one within the other, open at the top, and having the inner cylinder perforated with holes. The goods to be dried are placed within the inner cylinder, and the machine is then made to rotate with great velocity, when, by the action of centrifugal force, the water escapes through the holes. The action of the drying machine is the same in principle as that witnessed when a person trundles a mop to dry it. Also called extractor.

drying-off (dri'ing-ōf'), n. The process by which an amalgam of gold is evaporated, as in gilding.

drying-plate (dri'ing-plāt), n. One of a series of frames in a malt-kiln, covered with woven wire, and placed one over the other, so that the hot air from the flues beneath may ascend through them and dry malt placed in them.

drying-tube (dri'ing-tub), n. A tube filled with some material having a great avidity for moisture, such as calcium chloride, sulphuric acid, or phosphoric anhydride, and used to dry a current of gas which is passed through it, or to retain the moisture evolved from a substance so that it can be weighed.

Drying tube.

addition to the hind wings, or, when the wings are wanting in the female, by enlarged apical front feet. The wings as species resemble ants.

Dryinus (dri'i-nus), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1804), < Gr. dryos (of a tree, esp. of the oak) < E. tree], < dry, a tree, the oak; see dryad.] 1. In cutum, the typical genus of Dryinus, having the vertex impressed and the wings ample. It is wide spread, and the species appear to be parasite upon leaf hoppers. D. atriventris of North America is an example.

2. In bryet., a genus of whip-snakes, of the family Dryophidae, distinguished from Dryophis (which see) by having smooth instead of keeled scales. Merrim, 1820; Wagler.

dryly, drily (dri'li), adv. [< dry + -ly.] 1. Without moisture.

It looks ill, it eats drily, marry, 'tis a withered pear.

Shak., All's Well, i. 1.

2. Without embellishment; without anything to enliven, enrich, or entertain.

The poet either drily didative gives us rules which might appear absolute, even in a system of ethics, or triflingly volatile writes upon the most unworthy subjects. Goldsmith, The Vicar of Wakefield in England.

3. Coldly; frigidly; without affection.

Valour is but drily praised and staves

Bruden, or of Juvenal's Satires

4. Severely; harshly; inconsiderately.

Concluding to himself how drily the king had been used by his council.

Bacon, Henry VII.

5. With apparently unintentional or sly humor or sarcasm.

Drymodes (dri-mō'dōz), n. [NL. (Gould, 1840), < Gr. drymōdēs, woody (of the wood) < drymōs, a coppice, wood, an oak coppice < drys, a tree, esp. the oak) < dōm, form.] A genus of Australian turdoid passerine birds. Its position is uncertain; by some it is referred to a family Timelidae. Also written Drymaudus.

Drymœca (dri-mō'kē), n. [NL. (Drymœca—Swainson, 1827), < Gr. drymōs, a coppice, + oikos, house, + dwello, dwell.] 1. A genus of small dentirostral oscine passerine birds, containing numerous characteristic African species known as grass-warblers; now commonly merged in Cisticola.—2. [l. c.] A member of this genus.

Also Drymonca.

Dryomys (dri-mō'mis), n. [NL. (Tschudi, 1846), < Gr. drymōs, a coppice, + mys, a mouse.] A notable genus of South American sigmodont rodents, of the family Muridae and subfamily Murinae. They have the upper lip cleft, the ears large, the tail long and scaly, the hind feet furnished on the sides, and the hind toes small, the first of them with a pair of tubercles, the second with 2 pairs, and the third with 1 pair.

dry-multure (dri'mul'tūr), n. In Scots law, a sum of money or quantity of corn paid yearly to a mill, whether those liable in the payment grind their grain at the mill or not. See thirlage.

dryness (dri'nes), n. [Formerly also driness; < ME. drynesse, < AS. drygness, drygness, etc., < dryge, dry; see dry and ness.] The character or state of being dry. Specifically—(a) Freedom from moisture; lack of water or other fluid; aridity; aridness (by Barrenness; by barrenness); want of that which interests, enlivens, or entertains; as, the dryness of style or expression; the dryness of a subject. (c) Want of feeling or sensibility in devotion; want of ardor, as, dryness of spirit. (d) In painting, hardness and formality of outline, or want of mellowness and harmony in color. (e) In sculp., want of tenderness in form.

dry-nurse (dri'nērs), n. 1. A nurse who attends and feeds a child, but does not suckle it. Compare wet-nurse.—2. One who stands in another in a relation somewhat similar; hence, especially, an inferior who instructs his superior in his duties. [Slang.]

Grand caterer and dry nurse of the Church. Comper.

dry-nurse (dri'nērs), v. t. 1. To feed, attend, and bring up without suckling.—2. To instruct in the duties of a higher rank or position than one's own. [Slang.]

When a superior officer does not know his duty, and is instructed in it by an inferior officer, he is said to be dry-nursed. The inferior nurses the superior as a dry nurse rears an infant.

Dryobalanops (dri-ō-bal'a-nops), n. [NL., < Gr. dryobalanos, an acorn (< drys, a tree, esp. the oak, + balanos, an acorn or any similar fruit), + ōps, face, appearance.] A small go-nos of trees, belonging to the natural order Dipterocarpaceæ, natives of the Malay archipelago. The principal species, D. aromatica, is remarkable as the source of the Borneo or Sumatra camphor, which is found filling cracks or cavities in the wood. See camphor.

Flowering branch of Camphor tree (Dryobalanops aromatica).

Dryocopus (dri-ō'kō-pus), n. [NL., < Gr. drys, a tree, esp. the oak, + kopos, < kōpos, cut.] 1. A genus of woodpeckers, of which the great black woodpecker of Europe, Dryocopus martius, is the type. This bird is one of the largest of its tribe, black with a scarlet crest, and resembles somewhat the Ivory-billed and pileated woodpeckers of the United States. It inhabits northern portions of Europe. Bon., 1820.

2. A genus of South American tree-crapers. Also Dendrocercus. Maximilian, 1831.

Dryodromas (dri-ō-drō-mas), n. [NL. (Hartlaub and Finsch, 1869), < Gr. drys, a tree, esp. the oak, + dromos, running, < dromos, run.] A genus of African warblers, the dryodromes, as D. fulvicaapilla of South Africa.

dryodrome (dri-ō-drōm), n. A bird of the genus Dryodromas.

Dryolestes (dri-ō-les'tēs), n. [NL., < Gr. drys, a tree, esp. the oak, + olestes, a robber.] A genus of fossil pantotherian mammals of the Jurassic age, remains of which are found in the Atlantocrurus beds of the Rocky Mountain region of North America, indicating an animal related to the opossum.

Dryolestidae (dri-ol-est'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dryolestes + -idae.] A family of extinct marsupial mammals, represented by the genus Dryolestes.

Dryophidae (dri-ōf'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dryophis + -idae.] A family of aglyphodont or colubiform serpents; the whip-snakes. They have an extremely slender form and a greenish color, their habits are arboreal, and they inhabit warm countries. The pupil is horizontal, and the dentition characteristic; the snout is sometimes prolonged into a flexible appendage. There are several genera.

Dryophis (dri-ō-fis), n. [NL., < Gr. ōphis, a tree, esp. the oak, + ōpis, snake.] A genus of colubiform serpents, typical of the family Dryophidae, or whip-snakes, having no nasal appendage and keeled scales. D. acuminata and D. argentea are two South American species.

Dryopithecus (dri-ō-pi-thē'kus), n. [NL., < Gr. ōpis, a tree, esp. the oak, + πίθηκος, an ape.] A genus of extinct anthropoid apes from the Miocene of France, of large size and among the highest simians, regarded by (Gervais and Lartet as most closely related to the early ancestors of man. These apes were of nearly human stature, and were probably arboreal and frugivorous.

Dryoscopus (dri-ōs-kō-pus), n. [NL. (Boie, 1826), < Gr. ōpis, a tree, esp. the oak, + σκοπεῖν, view.] An extensive genus of shrikes, of the family Laniidae, containing about 22 species, all confined to Africa. The type is D. cuba. The bill is always hooked and notched, but varies in proportion of height to width in different species. The nostrils are oval and exposed, the wings and tail rounded and of about equal lengths, and the tail scutellate. The plumage of the back and rump is extremely fluffy; the coloration is black and white, sometimes with an ochraceous tinge but without any bright colors, and is alike in both sexes. Also called Hypodanotus, Chamaenotus, and Rhynchastur.

dry-point (dri'point), n. and a. I. n. 1. A steel instrument or etching-needle with a sharp point, used by etchers to cut delicate lines on copperplates from which the etching-ground has been removed. The bar raised by the cutting of the metal is either left standing on one side of the furrow to catch the printing ink and produce a mezzotint effect of more or less deep tone, or removed with the burnisher so that the line may yield a clean impression.

2. The process of engraving with the dry-point. II. a. In engraving, an epithet applied to a line made with the dry-point, or to an engraving produced by means of that instrument.

dry-pointing (dri'poin'ting), n. The grinding of needles and table-forks.

Drypta (drip'tā), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1801), irreg. < Gr. δρυπτω (f), tear, strip.] A genus of elaphidomorph beetles, of the family Carabidae. The type of small size and slender, graceful form. There are 2 to 30 species, confined to the old world, especially well represented in the East Indies and Africa; only 2 are European. D. marginatus of Europe is the type.

Dryptidae (drip'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Laporte, 1844), < Drypta + -idae.] A family of Coleoptera, named from the genus Drypta, now merged in Carabidae.

dry-rent (dri'rent), n. In law, a rent reserved without clause of distress.

dryrhead, n. A false spelling of drearhead.

dry-rot (dri'rot), n. 1. A decay affecting timber, occasioned by various species of fungi, the mycelium of which penetrates the timber, destroying it.

2. Figuratively, a concealed or unsuspected inward decay or degeneration, as of public morals or public spirit.

dry-rub (dri'rūb), v. t. To make clean by rubbing without wetting.

dry-salt (dri'salt), v. t. To cure (fish, meat, hides, etc.) by salting and drying; dry-cure.

dry-salter (dri'sāl'tēr), n. [< dry-salt, v., + -er.] 1. A dealer in salted or dried meats, pickles, sauces, etc.

I became a merchant—a wholesale trafficker . . . in everything, from barrels of gunpowder down to a pickled herring. In the civic acceptance of the word, I am a merchant; amongst the vulgar, I am called a dry-salter. T. Hook, Gilbert Thurney, III. ii.

2. A dealer in dyestuffs, chemical products, etc. [Great Britain.]

dry-salt (dri'sāl'tēr), n. [< dry-salt + -ry.] 1. The business of a dry-salter. 2. The articles kept by a dry-salter.

dry-shod (dri'shōd), a. Having dry shoes or feet.

Dry-shod to pass the parts the floods in way. Spenser, F. Q., I. x. 20.

Those Feet, that dry-shod past the Grimsin Gulf, Now dance (alas!) before a Mollen Calm.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II., The Lawe.

dry-stone (dri'stōn), a. Composed of stones not cemented with mortar; as, "dry-stone walls," Scott.

dry-stove (dri'stōv), n. A glazed structure for containing plants which are natives of dry climates.

dryth, n. [< dry + -th; a mod. formation, as a var. of drouth, with direct ref. to dry. See drought, drouth.] Same as drought.

dry-vat (dri'vat), n. A basket, box, or packing-case for containing articles of a dry kind. Also dry-fat.

I am a broken vessel, all runs out:

A shrunk old dry-fat.

B. Johnson, Staple of News, III. 2.

Charles has given o'er the world; I'll undertake to buy his birthright of him.

For a dry-fat of new books.

Fletcher (and another), Elder Brother, I. 2.

D. S. An abbreviation of dal segno.

d/s. An abbreviation of days' night, common in commercial writings; as, a bill payable at 10 d/s. (that is, ten days after sight).

D. Sc. An abbreviation of Doctor of Science.

dso. [E. Ind.] A valuable hybrid between the yak and the common cow. Encyc. Brit., XIV. 197.

D-string (dō'string), n. The third string on the violin, and the second on most other instruments played with a bow; the third string on the guitar.

duad (dū'ad), n. [Var. of dyad, after L. duo, two; see dyad, duā.] 1. Same as dyad. 2. In math., an unordered pair; two objects considered as making up one, and as the same one whichever is taken first.

duadic (dū-ad'ik), a. 1. Same as dyadic. 2. In math., composed of unordered pairs.

duā (dū'ā), a. and n. [< L. duālis, of two (in gram. tr. Gr. δυάδος), < duo = Gr. δύο = E. two, q. v.] I. a. 1. Relating to two; specifically, in gram., expressing two, as distinguished from singular, expressing one, and from plural, expressing more than two. The language of our family originally had a dual number, both in declension and in conjugation. It is preserved in Sanskrit and Greek, and less fully in other tongues, as Gothic. Dual forms also occur in other families.

2. Composed or consisting of two parts, qualities, or natures, which may be separately considered; twofold; binary; dualistic; as, the dual nature of man, spiritual and corporeal.

Paint glimpses of the dual life of old, Inward, grand with awe and reverence; outward, mean and coarse and cold. Whittier, Harrison of Cape Ann.

II. n. In gram., the number relating to two; the dual number.

The employment of a duā for the pronouns of the first and second persons marks an early date.

Georgian and Etruscan (E. K. T. S.), Prof., p. xlv.

dualin (dū'ā-lin), n. [< dual, of two, + -in.] A mixture of 30 parts of fine sawdust, 20 of saltpeter, and 50 of nitroglycerin, used as an explosive. Also called dualin-dynamite.

dualism (dū'ā-lizm), n. [< F. dualisme = Sp. Fig. It. dualismo = D. G. dualismus = Dan. dualisme = Sw. dualism: as dual + -ism.] 1. Division into two; a twofold division; duality.

An inevitable dualism besets nature, so that each thing is a half, and suggests another thing to make it whole; as, spirit, matter; man, woman; odd, even; subjective, objective; in, out; upper, under; motion, rest; yes, nay. . . . The same dualism underlies the nature and condition of man. Emerson, Compensation.

2. In philos., in general, that way of thinking which seeks to explain all sorts of phenomena by the assumption of two radically independent and absolute elements, without any continuous gradation between them: opposed to monism. In particular, the term is applied:—(a) To the doctrine that spirit and matter exist as distinct substances, thus being opposed both to idealism and to materialism.

Berkley then is right in triumphing over Realism and Dualism. Right in saying that if he were to accord them the existence of matter they could make no use of it. The subject would remain as dark as before. G. H. Lewes.

(b) To the doctrine of a double absolute, especially a principle of good and a principle of evil, or a male and a female principle.

Radimentary forms of Dualism, the antagonism of a Good and Evil Deity, are well known among the lower races of mankind. E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture, II. 227.

3. In theol.: (a) The doctrine that there are two independent divine beings or eternal principles, one good and the other evil: characteristic especially of Parsism and various Gnostic systems. (b) The heretical doctrine, attributed to Nestorius by his opponents, of the twofold personality of Christ, the divine logos dwelling as a separate and distinct person in the man Christ Jesus, and the union of the two natures being somewhat analogous to the indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the believer; that view of the personality of Christ which regards him as consisting of two personalities.—4. In chem., a theory advanced by Berzelius which assumed that every compound, whether simple or complex, must be constituted of two parts of which one is positively and the other negatively electrified. Thus, for example, sodium sulphate is put together not from sulphur, oxygen, and sodium, but from sulphuric acid and soda, which can themselves be separated into positive and negative constituents. Natur. Principles of Chemistry.

5. In general, any system or theory involving a duality of principles.—Creatural dualism. See creatural.—Hypothetic dualism. See hypothetic.—Natural dualism, the doctrine of a real subject and a real object in cognition accepted unreflectively.—Persian dualism, the doctrine of a good and an evil active principle struggling against each other in the government of human affairs and destiny.—Realistic dualism, the doctrine that the universe consists of two kinds of realities, spirit and matter.

dualist (dū'ā-list), n. [= F. dualiste = Sp. Pg. It. dualista = D. Dan. Sw. dualist; as dual + -ist.] One who holds the doctrine of dualism in any of its forms; an opponent of monism; especially, one who admits the existence both of spirit and of matter. Craig.

dualistic (dū'ā-lis'tik), a. [= F. dualistique (cf. D. G. dualistisch = Dan. Sw. dualistisk); as dualist + -ic.] 1. Consisting of two; characterized by duality. 2. Of or pertaining to dualism; not monistic.

The dualistic doctrine of a separate mind is therefore based upon an artificial and impossible separation of the two necessarily co-existent sides of thought, life, namely, the plastic and the functional.

Maudsley, Body and Will, p. 118.

In the Mazdean or Zoroastrian religion we have the best example of a dualistic faith. Faiths of the World, p. 350.

duality (dū'ā-lī'tē), n. [< ME. dualite = F. dualité = Pr. dualitat = Sp. dualidad = Pg. dualidade = It. dualità, < L. as if dualita(t)-is*, < duālis, dual: see duā.] The state of being two, or of being divided into two; twofold division or character; twoness.

This duality after Reformation is founded in every creature, be it never so single of kind.

Treatment of Love, II.

Though indeed they be really divided, yet are they so united as they seem but one, and make rather a duality than two distinct souls.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, II. 8.

To the schoolmen the duality of the universe appeared under a different aspect.

Huxley, Nineteenth Century, XXI. 102.

The principle of duality, in geom., the principle that in any proposition not involving measure, if for "point" be everywhere substituted "plane," and vice versa, the latter proposition will be as true as the former.

Upon this supposition of a positive curvature, the whole of geometry is far more complete and interesting; the principle of duality, instead of half breaking down over metric relations, applies to all propositions without exception. W. K. Clifford, Lectures, I. 222.

duā (dū'ā), n. [< Gael. duan, a poem, canto, ode, song, ditty, oration, = Ir. duan, a poem, song. Cf. Ir. duar, a word, saying, duar, a poet.] A division of a poem; a canto; also, a poem or song. Burns; Byron.

duarchy (dū'ar-ki), n.; pl. duarchies (-kiz). [*Prop. dyarchy, < Gr. δύο, = E. two + αρχία, < ἀρχα, rule.] Government by two persons; diarchy (which see).

Siam is practically a monarchy, although nominally a duarchy, the second king hardly holding the power of a vice-king. Harper's Weekly, XXVIII. 328.

dub (dub), v. t.; prot. and pp. dubbed, ppr. dubbing. [< ME. dubben, rarely dobben, dubben, dub (also in comp. adubben: see adub), < late AS. dubban* (only once in prot. dubbað: "Be cyng [William the Conqueror] dubbed his suna Henric to riders." the king dubbed his son Henry a knight) (whence the equiv. leol. dubba til riddara, Sw. dubba till riddare; leol. dubba, also, equip with arms, dress), < OF.

Despising wind, and rain, and fire.

Rurus, Tam o' Shanter.

dub-a-dub (dub'-a-dub'). [See dub². Cf. rub-a-dub.] An imitation of the sound of a drum. See second extract under dream¹, 1.

dubash (dub'-ash), n. Same as dobhash.

dubb (dub), n. [Ar. (> Pers.) dubb, a bear.] A name of the Syrian bear.

dubbeh (dub'-e), n. [Ar. dabba.] The modern Egyptian name of the common wooden lock used in Cairo and elsewhere in the East. It has a square bolt of wood, sometimes as much as two feet long, in which are a number of holes arranged in a pattern; a movable block, above and resting upon the bolt, has iron pegs corresponding to the holes in the bolt. The key, also of wood, has also pegs or pins by means of which the pins of the lock are pushed up, allowing the bolt to slide. Also spelled dobbeh.

dubber¹, n. A furberisher of old clothes. York Plays, Int., p. lxxx.

dubber² (dub'-er), n. [Repr. Gujarati dubaro (cerebral d), a leathern vessel, bottle, etc.] In India, a large leathern vessel made of untanned hide of the buffalo or the goat, and used for holding oil, ghee, etc. Also written dapper.

3. The act of striking, cutting, rubbing, or dressing, so as to make smooth or otherwise adapted to a purpose. (a) Increasing by means of an adz. (b) Rubbing with grease, as leather when being curried. See dipping, 4. (c) Raising a nap on cloth by means of teazels.

Hence—4. A preparation of grease for use in currying leather.—5. The materials used for making the body of a fishing fly. The term is applied more particularly to material of short fibres used in making the body of the fly, as fur, pig's wool, or pig's down. It is spun sparsely around the waisted wrapping silk and wound on with it. The materials commonly used are mohair, worst wool, pig's wool, floss silk, and hanks of peacock feathers or of stretch fishing. Wool is least used for dubbing, especially in trout fishing, as it absorbs too much water and makes the fly soggy. It is used, however, for salt water flies, and a wool being preferred.

Take your dubbing which is to make the body of your fly, as much as you think convenient.

Cotton, in Walton's Angler, II. 245.

dubbing-tool (dub'-ing-tool), n. A tool for paring or smoothing off an irregular surface; an adz.

The consort or widow of a duke, or a woman who holds the sovereignty or titles of a duchy.

Ich am hus dore doubeter, duchess of hevene.

Piers Plowman (C), III, 33.

The dictionary definition is far from being exhaustive, since, obviously, where so created, or where the terms of the patent so run, a duchesse may be duchesse in her own right. There is no antonymy to resolve in the case of a princess being also a duchesse. N. and Q., 7th ser., IV, 339.

2. A variety of roofing-slate two feet long and one foot wide.—3. A part of ladies' head-dresses in the seventeenth century, apparently a knot of ribbon.

So diver, dipper, dwyper, etc., names applied to diving birds.] 1. A lamellirostral natatorial bird of the family Anatidae and subfamily Anatinae or Fuligulinae (which see). The technical distinction between any duck and other birds of the same family, as geese and swans, is not clear; but a duck may usually be recognized by the broad and flat bill, short legs, scutellate tail, and entirely feathered head. The common wild duck or mallard is Anas boschas, the feral stock of the domestic duck. The species of ducks are numerous, about 125, divided into some 40 modern genera, and found in nearly all parts of the world. Most ducks fall in one or the other of two series, fresh-water ducks or river-ducks, Anatinae, and salt-water ducks or sea-ducks, Fuligulinae; and from the latter a few are sometimes detached to form a third subfamily, Ardeininae; but the implied distinction in habits by no means holds good, since some or any river-ducks may be found in salt water, and few if any sea-ducks are entirely maritime. The mallard and closely related species now form the restricted genus Anas. Teal are small ducks, chiefly of the genus Querquedula; Q. ciria is the garganey. The widgeons form the genus Marula; the gadwall, Chaulestomus; the spoonbills, Scolopax; the pintails or stygia, Dafila. Certain arboreal ducks of various parts of the world constitute the genus Dendrocygna. The muscovy duck or mandarin duck is Cairina moschata. The celebrated mandarin duck of China and the wood-duck or summer duck of the United States are two species of the genus A. A. garrulata and A. sponsa. Sheldrakes or barrow-ducks are of the genus Caseros or Tadorna. A number of sea-ducks with black or red heads are placed in genera variously named Fuligula, Fulix, Atya, Syrnoides, etc.; such are the scaup and pochards, the canvasback, and others. The buffheads, goldeneyes, and whistlings belong to a ge-century, by the Norman duke Roger II. In 1283 a gold ducat was struck in Venice, but the piece was afterward called a zechino (seignin), the ducat becoming only a money of account. (See def. 2.) The earliest gold coins of Germany seem to have been called ducat, and this name was applied to German gold coins of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Gold coins called ducat were also issued in the Netherlands, in Hungary, and elsewhere. The value of the ducat varied but little, the coin usually containing from 3.43 to 3.44 grains of fine gold, worth from $2.27 to $2.32.

If every ducat in six thousand ducat Were in six parts, and every part a ducat, I would not draw them.

Shak., M. of V., IV, 1.

Take you a ducket, or your chequins of gold, and apply to the place affected.

R. Johnson, Volpone, II, 1.

After it grew tributary to the Turks; yet was it governed and possessed by the Genoese, who paid for their immunity the Annual sum of fourteen thousand ducat.

Sander, Traveller, p. 11.

2. An old money of account in the Venetian republic.

Now whereas the Venetian ducat is much spoken of, you must consider that this word ducat doth not signify any one certain coin; but many several pieces do concur to make one ducat.

Corpus, Cruditie, II, 68.

are variously called Cleopatra, Glaucous, and Bucephala. The harlequin duck is Histrionicus histrionicus or H. minutus. The old-wife or long-tailed duck is Harleia glacialis. The Labrador duck, Camptolampus labradorius, is notable as being probably on the point of extinction; it is a near relative of the steamer-duck of South America, Micropodiceps cucullatus. Eiders are large sea-ducks of the genus Somateria and some related genera. Scoters and surf-ducks, also called sea-coots, are large black sea-ducks of the genus Mareca and its subdivisions. The ruddy ducks belong to the genus Erythroneura and some related genera. Fishing-ducks, so called, are not properly ducks, but mergansers (Mergus).

The duck and mallard first, the falconers only sport.
Dryden, Polyolbion, xiv.

2. The female duck, as distinguished from the male, or drake (which see).—3. Some web-footed bird likened to or mistaken for a duck: as, the cobbler's-awl duck (that is, the avocet).—4. One of the stones used in playing the game of duck on drake.—Acorn-duck, the summer duck or wood-duck, Aix sponsa. [Maryland, Carolina, U. S.]—American scamp duck, a variety of the common scamp peculiar to America, Aythya marila macrotis.—Bimaculated duck. See bimaculate.—Black duck. (a) The dusky duck. (b) The velvet scoter. (c) The surf scoter. [Local, U. S.]—Black English duck, the dusky duck. [Southern U. S.]—Blaten duck, the gadwall—that is, the blaten or blotting duck. [New Jersey, U. S.]—Bombay duck. See bombay.—Brahminy duck. See brahminy.—Buffalo-headed, buff-head, buffel's-head, or buffe-headed duck. Same as buffel.—Butter-duck. (a) The butterball. [Georgia, U. S.] (b) The ruddy duck. [Virginia, U. S.]—Cayuga duck, a large black variety of the domestic duck. It has been recently introduced into England.—Channel-duck, the velvet scoter. [De Kay, 1844; Trumbull, 1858].—Stock-duck, the mallard.—Summer duck, a duck which summers or breeds in a given place or region. Specifically: (a) The wood duck (which see). [U. S.] (b) The garganey or summer teal, Querquedula cyanus. [Engl.]—Surf-duck, a sea duck of the genus Mareca: a scoter; a sea-coot; specifically, M. peraculata, inhabiting North America at large, especially eastward, the male of which is black with a white patch on the nose and another on the poll, and the bill pinkish white, orange, and black.—Swallow-tailed duck, the long-tailed duck. [Newman and Richardson, 1841. (Hudson's Bay).]—To make or play (at) duck and drake, to make or play ducks and drakes. (a) To cast or shyn a flat stone a piece of slate, etc., along the surface of water so as to cause it to strike and rebound repeatedly.

What watered slates are best to make on watery surface duck and drake.
S. Butler, Hudibras.

Duck and Drake is a very silly pastime, though inferior to few in point of antiquity, . . . and was anciently played with flat shells, testularium maritimum, which the boys throw into the water, and the whorlshell rebounded most frequently from the surface below it finally sunk was the conqueror.

Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 401.

Hence:—(b) To handle or use a thing recklessly, scatter; squander; throw into confusion; with with or of.

He (the unscientific etymologist) has now added to his marvellous capacity for philological blundering the power of wandering into the field of comparative philology and of there playing ducks and drakes with the Aryan roots and their permutations.

My fortune is now inherited: a million acquisitions I can make ducks and drakes of it. So don't provoke me.
H. Mackenzie, Man of the World, II. 1.

Tree-duck. (a) Any duck of the genus Dendrocygna (which see). (b) The wood duck or summer duck, which breeds in trees. (c) The hooded merganser, so called from breeding in trees. [R. Ridgway. (Indiana, Illinois, U. S.)]

Tufted duck, the ring-necked scoter, Aythya collaris or Fulidula ruficapilla. A. Wilson.—Velvet duck, the velvet or white-winged scoter. [Edwards].—Wheat-duck, the American wildgeese. [D. Crary. (Oregon, U. S.)]

Whistle-duck. See whistling.—Whistling duck or coot, the American black scoter. White-faced duck or teal, the blue-winged teal. See teal.—White-winged surf-duck, the velvet scoter. [See scoter].—Wild duck, specifically, the mallard. [Winter duck, the long-tailed duck. U. S.]—Wood duck. See wood duck.

duck³ (duk), n. [Prob. a familiar use of duck², like dare, chick¹ = chuck², mouse, lamb, F. paille, and other zoological terms of endearment; but cf. duck's-meat, n. See duck-meat.

duck-snipe (duk'snip), n. The semipalmated tatter or willet, Symphemia semipalmata. Dr. Henry Bryant, 1839. [Bahamae.]

duckweed (duk'weid), n. Same as duck-meat.

duck-weight (duk'wat), n. A stone figure of a duck, used as a weight in ancient Assyria and Babylonia. It was usually inscribed with a legend giving the name of the king and the value of the weight in minas, as "30 minas, Palace of Irba Merodach, King of Babylon."

Duclair duck. See duck.

duct (dukt), n. [Also, as L. ductus; = OF. duit, duit, duit = Pe. ducto = It. dutto, ductus, a leading, a conduit-pipe (cf. aqueduct, conduit, douche), (ducere, pp. ductus, lead, conduct, draw, bring forward, etc. (in a great variety of uses), = Goth. tiukan = OHG. zuhan, MIIG. G. zuhen = AS. tēon, draw, > ult. E. tow, tug; was toel, tug, tuck, etc. The L. ducere is the ult. source of very many E. words, as abduce, adduce, conduce, deduce, educer, inducer, introduce, produce, reduce, seduce, traduce, abduct, conduct, etc., conduit, conduit, aqueduct, viaduct, etc., caduce, subduce, etc., educate, etc., ductile, etc., duke, doge, ducat, duchy, etc.] 1. Leading; guidance; direction; bearing.

According to the duct of this hypothesis

Glanville, Pre existence of Souls, p. 146.

2. Any tube or canal by which a fluid is conducted or conveyed. Specifically (a) In anat., one of the vessels of an animal body by which the blood, chyle, lymph, secretions, etc., are conveyed. See ductus.

The little ducts began

To feed thy bones with lime, and ran

Their course, till thou wert also man.

Tennyson, Two Voices

(b) In bot.: (1) A long continuous vessel or canal, formed by a row of cells which have lost their intervening partitions. The walls are variously marked by pits and by spiral, annular, or reticulated thickenings, and the cavity may be filled with air or water, or they may be lactiferous. (2) In bryophytes, the narrow continuous cells which surround the arches in the leaves of Sphagnum.

Aberrant duct of the testis. See aberrant.

Acoustic duct. See acoustic and auditory.

Annular duct. See annular.

Archinephric duct, the duct of the archinephron, or primitive kidney.

Arterial duct, auditory duct, branchial duct. See the adjectives.

Biliary duct, one of the ramified systems of ducts which collect the bile from the liver and by their union form the hepatic duct.

Cystic duct, the duct of the gall bladder conveying bile into the intestine, either directly or, as in man, by uniting with the hepatic duct in a ductus communis cholechodus.

Duct or canal of Bartholin, one of the ducts of the sublingual gland, running alongside of Wharton's duct, and opening into it or close to its orifice into the mouth.

Duct of Gartner. Same as Gartnerian canal (which see, under canal).

Duct or canal of Müller (ductus Müllerii), the primitive excretory, or passage, in the female from the ovary to the exterior, which subsequently becomes converted, as in mammals, into the Fallopian tube, uterine, etc. One Müllerian duct may be obliterated, or both may persist, in different mammals, or the two may be united in one in most of their extent, giving rise to a single uterus and vagina with a pair of Fallopian tubes.

Duct or canal of Wharton. See Wharton's duct, below.

Duct or canal of Wirsung. See pancreatic duct.

Ducts or canals of Rivinus (ductus Riviniani), those ducts of the sublingual gland which open apart from one another and from Wharton's duct.

Ducts or canals of Stenson, the communication of Jacobson's organ with the buccal cavity.

Efferent duct. Same as efferent canal (which see, under canal).

Ejaculatory duct or canal. See ejaculatory duct.

See ductus ejaculatorius, under ductus.

Galactophorous duct, one of the lactiferous ducts of the mammary gland which terminate in the nipple.

Genito-urinary duct. See the extract.

In the Urostele, the vasa efferentia of each testis enter the inner side of the corresponding kidney, and traverse it, leaving its outer side to enter a peno-urinary duct, which lies on the outer side of the kidney, ends blindly in front, and opens behind into the cloaca. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 163.

Hepatic duct, the duct of the liver, conveying bile to the intestine, either directly or, as in man, by uniting with the cystic duct to form the ductus communis cholechodus. It is formed in man of two main branches which issue from the liver at the transverse fissure, one from the right, the other from the left lobe, and unite in one trunk before joining the cystic duct.

All the ducts from the liver and gall bladder are sometimes known as biliary ducts, collectively.

Lactiferous duct. Same as galactophorous duct.

Lymphatic duct. See lymphatic.

Nasal duct, the membranous tube leading from the lacrimal sac to open into the inferior meatus of the nose.

Obliterated duct. See obliterate.

Pancreatic duct, the duct of the pancreas, discharging the pancreatic secretion into the intestine.

In man the principal pancreatic duct is also called duct of Wirsung.

Parotid duct. Same as ductus Stenonii (which see, under ductus).

Secondary archinephric duct. See the extract.

In both sexes the products excreted by an apparatus which is homologous with the Mullerian duct, consisting of a canal of varying length and provided with an infundibular orifice, which is attached to the greater (secondary archinephric duct). This takes up the generative products. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (Strana), p. 610.

Steno's duct. See ductus Stenonii, under ductus.

Thoracic duct, the ductus thoracicus, the common trunk of all the lymphatics, excepting those which form the right lymphatic duct, conveying the great mass of lymph and chyle directly into the venous circulation; so called from its course through the cavity of the thorax. In man this duct is from 15 to 18 inches long; it begins opposite the second lumbar vertebra, by a dilated sac or cyst (the receptaculum chyli or cistern of Pecquet), and runs up to the root of the neck, alongside the vertebral column, passing through the aortic orifice of the diaphragm. It ends in the venous system at or near the junction of the left internal jugular and subclavian veins. It is composed of 3 coats, and is provided with valves. Its caliber varies between that of a crow-quill and of a goose-quill. — Wharton's or Whartonian duct (ductus Whartonii; named for Thomas Wharton, an English physician, author of "Adenographia," 1666), the duct of the submaxillary gland, conveying saliva into the mouth, about 2 inches long, opening on a papilla at the side of the frenum lingue, or bridle of the tongue. — Wolfian duct. See ductus Wolffii, under ductus.

ductible (duk'ti-bl), a. [L. as if ductibilis* (cf. ML. ductibilis), ductus, pp. of ducere, lead; see duct.] Capable of being drawn out; ductile. [Rare.]

The purest gold is most ductible.

Feltham, Resolves, II. 2.

ductile (duk'til), a. [= F. ductile = Sp. dúctil = It. duttil = It. duttile, ductile, that may be led, extended, or hammered out thin, < ductus, pp. of ducere, lead; see duct.] 1. Susceptible of being led or drawn; tractable; complying; yielding to persuasion or instruction; as, the ductile mind of youth; a ductile people.

The sinful wretch has by her arts defiled

The ductile spirit of my darling child.

Crabbe, Works, IV. 139.

Says he, "while his mind's ductile and plastic,

I'll place him at both boys and Hall,

Where he'll learn all that's new and gymnastic."

Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 163.

The overwhelming popularity of "Guzman de Alfarache" rendered this form of fiction so generally welcome in Spain that it made its way into the ductile dream.

Tucknor, Spain, Lit., III. 100.

2. Flexible; pliable.

The ductile rind and leaves of radiant gold.

Dryden, Eneid.

The toughest and most knotty parts of language became ductile at his touch.

Macaulay, Dryden.

3. Capable of being drawn out into wire or threads; as, gold is the most ductile of the metals.

All bodies, ductile and tensile, as metals, that will be drawn into wire.

Lacoe.

ductilely (duk'til-i), adv. In a ductile manner. Impr. Dict.

ductileness (duk'til-nēs), n. The quality of being ductile; capability of receiving extension by drawing; ductility. [Rare.]

I, when I value gold, may think upon

The ductileness, the application.

Dennis, Elegies, xviii.

ductilimeter (duk-ti-lim'e-tor), n. [= F. ductilimètre, ductile, + metrum, measure.] An instrument for showing with precision the ductility of metals.

ductility (duk-ti-l'i-ti), n. [= F. ductilité = Sp. ductilidad = It. duttilità, ductility, ductile, < L. as if ductilitas*, < ductilis, ductile; see ductile.] 1. That property of solid bodies, particularly metals, which renders them capable of being extended by drawing, with correlative diminution of their thickness or diameter, without any actual fracture or separation of parts. On this property the wire-drawing of metals depends. It is greatest in gold and least in lead. Mr. Wollaston succeeded in obtaining a wire of platinum only seven of an inch in diameter.

The order of ductility is — Gold, Silver, Platinum, Iron, Copper, Palladium, Aluminum, Zinc, Tin, Lead.

A. Daniell, Prin. of Physics, p. 232.

2. Flexibility; adjustability; ready compliance.

It is to this ductility of the laws that an Englishman owes the freedom he enjoys.

Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, I.

In none of Dryden's works can be found passages more pathetic and magnificent, greater ductility and energy of language, or a more pleasing and various music.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vii.

ductionist (duk'ahon), n. [L. ductio (n.), < ducere, pp. of ducere, lead; see duct.] Leading; guidance.

The but meanly wise and common ductions of debilitated nature.

Feltham, Resolves, II. 66.

ductless (dukt'les), a. [L. duct + -less.] Having no duct; as, a ductless gland. The so-called ductless glands of man are four — the spleen, thymus, thyroid, and adrenal. The last is a pair, and the others are single. See gland.

ductor (duk'tor), n. [L. ductor, a leader, < ducere, pp. ductus, lead; see duct.] 1. A leader. Sir T. Browne. — 2. An inking-roller on a printing-press which takes printing-ink from the ink-fountain and conducts it (whence the name) to the distributing-table and rollers. Improperly called doctor by many pressmen.

a, receptacle of the chyle, a, trunk of the thoracic duct opening at the root of left innominate vein at junction of left jugular and left subclavian veins; b, right innominate vein; c, d, e, several thoracic and lumbar lymphatic glands; f, a short portion of the esophagus. Two azygos veins run parallel with and on each side of the duct, until the left crosses behind the duct to join the right. The structures represented rest nearly upon the back-bone.

doctor-roller (duk'tor-rô'ler), n. Same as drop-roller.

ductule (duk'täl), n. [< NL. "ductulus, dim. of L. ductus, a duct: see duct."] A little duct. [Rare.]

As the ductules grow longer and become branched, vascular processes grow in between them.

Poster, Embryology, I. vi. 18.

ductures (duk'tür), n. [< ML. as if "ductura, < L. ductus, pp. of ducere, lead: see duct and -v."] Guidance; direction.

Interest and design are a kind of force upon the soul, bearing a man oftentimes besides the ducture of his native propensities.

South, Works, VIII. 1

ductus (duk'tus), n.; pl. ductus. [L.: see duct.] In anat., any duct, tube, pipe, canal, or other conduit. [In technical use the Latin form is commonly preserved.]—Ductus ad nasum (duct to the nose), the nasal or lacrimal duct, conveying tears from the eye to the nose.—Ductus arteriosus. Same as arterial duct (which see, under arterial).—Ductus Belliniani (duct of Bellini, the excretory tubes of the kidneys).—Ductus Botalli (duct of Botalli), a ductus arteriosus between the fourth aortic arch and the fifth; in mammals, the communication which persists during fetal life between the arch of the aorta and the pulmonary artery, on the closure of which passage, after birth, the duct becomes a fibrous cord, the ligamentum Botalli. The term is sometimes extended to the corresponding ductus arteriosus of other primitive aortic arches. So named from Leonardo Botalli, of Piedmont, born at Asti about 1580, who described it in 1586.—Ductus choleochus, a bile-duct; the common bile-duct. Also called ductus communis choleochus. See choleochus.—Ductus cochlearis, the cochlear canal (which see, under canal).—Ductus Cuvieri (duct of Cuvier), a short transverse venous trunk, formed on each side of a vertebrate embryo by the junction of anterior and posterior cardinal veins, the primitive anterior or superior vena cava, both of which may persist as two precaval veins, or, as usual in higher Vertebrata, one of which may be more or less obliterated, when a single (right) vena cava superior persists. Ductus ejaculatorius (ejaculatory duct), in both Vertebrata and many Invertebrata, the duct conveying semen from the testicles or associated structures to the canal of the intromittent organ, especially from the seminal vesicles to the urethra.—Ductus endolymphaticus, a tubular process of the membranous labyrinth of the ear which passes through the aqueductus vestibuli into the cranial cavity, where it terminates in a blind enlargement below the dura mater, the sacculus endolymphaticus. See labyrinth and sacculus vestibuli under vestibuli.—Ductus Gaertneri. Same as Gaertnerian canal (which see, under canal).—Ductus hepato-entericus, a bile-duct in general; a ductus choleochus; any excretory duct conveying the hepatic secretion into the intestine.—Ductus nasolacrimalis, the membranous tube consisting of the lacrimal sac and nasal duct.—Ductus oesophagocutaneus, a duct which places the oesophagus in communication with the bronchial pore and so with the exterior, in some fishes, as the hag, Myxine.—Ductus pneumaticus, a pneumatic duct; an air-duct or passage placing the cavity of any pneumatic organ in communication with the cavity of the exterior, as the air duct of a fish, in its higher development becoming any of the ordinary air passages of a body, as a windpipe, etc.—Ductus Rivini or Rivini duct, the duct of Rivinus (which see, under duct).—Ductus Stenonis (Steno's duct), the duct of the parotid gland, conveying saliva into the mouth; so called from the Danish anatomist Nicolaus Steno, of Copenhagen (1688–80). Also called parotid duct.—Ductus thoracicus (thoracic duct), the largest lymphatic vessel of the body, conveying chyle directly into the venous circulation. See chyle under duct.—Ductus venosus (venous duct), the communicating vein, in the fetus, between the inferior vena cava and the umbilical vein, obliterated soon after birth.—Ductus vitellinus, or ductus vitello-intestinalis (vitelline or vitello-intestinal duct), in a vertebrate embryo, the communication between the primitive intestine and the cavity of the yolk-sac or umbilical vesicle.—Ductus Wirungianus, the duct of Wirung, the principal pancreatic duct.—Ductus Wolffii (Wolffian duct), the excretory duct of the Wolffian body or primitive kidney, in the female soon disappearing (for the most part, in the male becoming the permanent vas deferens, or excretory duct of the testicle. (See also canal.)

dudd (dud), n. [< ME. dudde, dudde, a coarse cloak; said to be of Celtic origin. Cf. brat.] 1. A coarse cloak or mantle.

dudd, A rag.—3. pl. [Formerly also spelled dudes, as in Harman's "Caveat" (1567), where the word is erroneously set down as "pedlar's French"—that is, thieves' cant.] Clothes; especially, poor or ragged clothing; tatters: used in contempt. [Colloq. or humorous.]

The warrant it was the toe half of her feet and bountith, for she wared (wore) the ilther half on pinners and pearlings; . . . she'll ware t'a on duds and duffers.

Scott, Old Mortality, xiv.

Away I went to sea, with my duds tied in a han'kercher.

Mrs. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 54.

At some windows hung lace curtains, Samuel duds at some.

G. W. Cable, Old Creole Days, p. 151.

dudder (dud'er), v. [Var. of dodder² and dudle, q. v.] 1. intrans. To didder or dodder; shiver or tremble.

The windy cold, sure. I dudder and shake like an aspen leaf, every joint of me.

Ford and Dekker, Witch of Edmonton, II. 1.

II. trans. To shock with noise; deafen; confuse; confound; amaze. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.] dudder (dud'er), n. [< dudder¹, v.] Confusion; amazement; as, all in a dudder (that is, quite confounded). Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.] duddy (dud'i), n.; pl. duddies (-iz). [Dim. of dud.] A little rag. MacKay.

Cutler, in Froide, I. 271.

dude (dud), n. [A slang term said to have originated in London, England. It first became known in general colloquial and newspaper use at the time of the so-called "aesthetic" movement in dress and manners, in 1882–3. The term has no antecedent record, and is probably merely one of the spontaneous products of popular slang. There is no known way, even in slang etymology, of "deriving" the term, in the sense used, from duds (formerly sometimes spelled dudde: see duct), clothes, in the sense of "fine clothes"; and the connection, though apparently natural, is highly improbable.] A top or exquisite, characterized by affected refinements of dress, speech, manners, and gait, and a serious mien; hence, by an easy extension, and with loss of contempt, a man given to excessive refinement of fashion in dress.

There was one young man from the West, who would have been flattered with the application of dude, so attractive in the fit of his clothes, the manner in which he walked and used his cane and his eyeglass, that Mr. King wanted very much to get him and bring him away in a cage.

C. D. Warner, Their Philosophy, p. 190.

6. In law: (a) Owing, irrespective of whether the time of payment has arrived: as, money is said to be due to creditors although not yet payable. (b) Presently payable; already matured: as, a note is said to be due on the third day of grace. Due and payable, said of a subsisting debt the time for payment of which has arrived. Due notice, due diligence, such as the law requires under the circumstances. — Due process of law, in Amer. const. law, the due course of legal proceedings according to those rules and forms which have been established for the protection of private rights. Constitutional provisions securing to citizens due process of law imply judicial proceeding with opportunity to be heard, as distinguished from a legislative act. They refer generally to those processes which the American law inherited from the English common law, as part of the law of the land secured by Magna Charta; but they may include any new form of legal proceeding devised and sanctioned by legislative act, provided it be consonant with the recognized general principles of liberty and justice.

II. n. 1. That which is owed; that which is required by an obligation of any kind, as by contract, by law, or by official, social, or religious relations, etc.; a debt; an obligation.

duel (dū'el), n. [= D. Dan. duel = G. Sw. duell, < F. ducl, < It. duello = Sp. duelo = Pg. duello, < ML. duellum, lit. a combat between two, a restored form of L. bellum, OL. duellum, war (see bellicose, etc.), < duo = E. two.] 1. A single combat; specifically, a premeditated and prearranged combat between two persons with deadly weapons, and usually in the presence of at least two witnesses, called seconds, for the purpose of deciding a quarrel, avenging an insult, or clearing the honor of one of the combatants, or of some third party whose cause he champions. The origin of the modern practice of dueling was doubtless the judicial combat or wager of battle resorted to in the middle ages as a means of settling disputes. The practice was formerly common, but has generally been suppressed by adverse public opinion in civilized countries. — In England and the United States dueling is illegal, death resulting from this cause being regarded as murder; no matter how fair the combat may have been; and the seconds are liable to severe punishment as accessories. Deliberate dueling is where both parties meet avowedly with intent to murder. In law the offense of dueling consists in the invitation to fight; and the crime is complete on the delivery of a challenge.

They then advanced to fight the duel

And spurn out the duellists out of the kingdom
Fletcher (and another?), Nice Valour, III. 1.

2. The art or practice of dueling; or the code of laws which regulate it.

The gentleman will, for his honour's sake, have one bout with you: he cannot by the duello avoid it.

Shak., T. N., III. 4.

duelsome (dū'el-sum), a. [< duel + -some.] Inclined or given to dueling; eager or ready to fight duels. [Rare.]

Incidentally duelsome on his own account, he is for others the most acute and peaceable counsellor in the world.
Thackeray, Paris Sketch Book, II.

duena (dū-ā'nyā), n. [Sp.] See duenna.
dueness (dū'nes), n. [< duen + -ness.] Fittness; propriety; due quality. [Rare.]

That dueness, that debt (as I may call it), that obligation, which, according to the law of nature, is a way of meeting and comeliness, it was fit for God as a creator to deal with a creature.
Goodwin, Works, I. II. 126.

duenna (dū-en'ā), n. [Sp., formerly duenna; now spelled duena, vernacular form of duca, mistress, lady (fem. corresponding to maestro, master, don, sir), < L. domina, mistress, fem. of dominus, master: see dominus, doma², domna, etc.] 1. The chief lady in waiting on the Queen of Spain. — 2. An elderly woman holding a middle station between a governess and a companion, appointed to take charge of the girls of a Spanish family.

How could I know so little of myself when I sent my duenna to forbid your coming more under my ladies?

Sterne, Tristram Shandy, Blackburner's Tale.

3. Any elderly woman who is employed to guard a younger; a governess; a chaperon.

You are getting so very pretty that you absolutely need a duenna.
Hatchcock, Bithedale Romance, II.

duet (dū-et'), n. [Also, as It., duetto; = D. Dan. duet = G. Sw. duett = Sp. dueto = Pg. duetto, < It. duetto, < duo, < L. duo = E. two.] A musical composition either for two voices or for two instruments, and either with or without accompaniment.

duet¹, n. A Middle English form of duet.
duettino (dū-et-tē'no), n. [It., dim. of duetto, duet.] A short, unpretentious duet.

Artists and duettinos succeed each other.

Longfellow, Hyperion, p. 322.

duetto (dū-et'tō), n. [It.: see duet.] A duet.
Scott, Monastery, xviii.

due volte (dū'e vōl'te). [It.: due, fem. of duo, < L. duo = E. two; volte, pl. of volta, turn: see vault, n.] Two times; twice: a direction in musical compositions.

duff¹ (dūf), n. [Another form of dough (with f < gh, as in draught = draught, dwarf, etc.): see dough.] 1. Dough; paste of bread. (Prov. Eng.) — 2. Naut., a stiff flour pudding boiled in a bag or cloth: as, sailors' plum duff.

The crew . . . are allowed [on Sunday] a pudding, or, as it is called, a duff. This is nothing more than flour boiled with water, and eaten with molasses.

R. H. Dana, Jr., Before the Mast, p. 19.

3. Vegetable growth covering forest-ground. [Local, U. S.]

This duff (composed of rotten spruce-trees, cones, needles, etc.) has the power of holding water almost equal to the sponge, and, when it is thoroughly dry, burns like punk, without a blaze.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 282.

I have seen the smoke from fires in the duff even after the snow has fallen

Rep. of Forest Commission of State of New York, 1886, [p. 102.]

4. Fine coal.

duff² (dūf), v. i. [Scotch.] In golf, to hit the ground behind the ball.

duffar, n. Same as duffer², duffart.

duffart (dūf'art), n. and a. [See also dowfart, dowfart, < duff, q. v., + -art, -ard.] I. n. A dull, stupid fellow.

II. a. Stupid; dull; spiritless.

duff-day (dūf'dā), n. The day on which duff is served on board ship; Sunday.

duffel, n. and a. See duffle.

duffer¹ (dūf'er), n. [Origin obscure.] 1. A puddler; specifically, one who sells women's clothes.

A class of persons termed "duffers," "packmen," or "scotchmen," and sometimes "tallymen," traders who go rounds with samples of goods, and take orders for goods afterwards to be delivered, but who, carrying no goods for immediate sale, were not within the scope of the existing charge, were in 1861 brought within the charge by special enactment and rendered liable to duty. These duffers were numerous in Cornwall.
S. Dowell, Hist. Taxation, III. 33.

2. A hawker of cheap, flashy, and professedly smuggled articles; a hawker of sham jewelry. [Eng. in both uses.]

duffer² (dūf'er), n. [Appar. a var. of duffart, q. v.] A stupid, dull, plodding person; a logy; a person who only seemingly discharges the functions of his position; a dawdling, useless character: as, the board consists entirely of old duffers.

Duffers (if I may use a slang term which has now become classical, and which has no exact equivalent in English proper) are generally methodical and old. Facet certainly was a duffer.
Hood.

"And do you get $300 for a small picture?" Mackenzie asked severely. "Well, no," Johnny said, with a laugh, "but then I am a duffer."

W. Black, Princess of Thule, xiv.

The snob the cad, the prig, the duffer — du Mackenzie has given us a thousand times the portrait of such a specimen. No one has done the duffer so well.

H. James, Jr., The Century, XLVI. 24.

duffle, n. An obsolete spelling of duffel.
duffling (duf'ling), n. In angling, the body of an artificial fly.
duffel (duf'el), n. and a. (< D. duffel = L. duffel, a kind of coarse, thick, shaggy woolen cloth, = W. Flem. duffel, any shaggy material for wrapping up; cf. duffelen, wrap up, < duffel, a bundle or bunch (of rags, hay, straw, etc.) (Wedgwood). Usually referred to duffel, a town near Antwerp.] I. n. 1. A coarse woolen cloth having a thick nap or frize, generally knotted or tufted.
 And let it be of duffel grey
 As warm a cloak as man can sell.
 Wordsworth, Allice Fell.
 They secured to one corporation the monopoly to continue to introduce . . . trade guns, fishing and trapping gear, calico, duffel, and gowaws.
 W. Barrow, Oregon, p. 89.

2. a. Baggage; supplies; specifically, a sportsman's or camper's outfit.
 Every one has gone to his chosen ground with too much impedimenta, too much duffel.
 G. W. Sears, Woodcraft, p. 4.

II. a. Made of duffel.
 She was going . . . to buy a brand-new duffel cloak.
 Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, II.

dufoil (du'foil), n. and a. (< L. duo (= E. two) + E. foil, < L. folium, a leaf. Cf. trefoil, etc.) I. n. In her., a head of two leaves growing out of a stem. Otherwise called trifol.
 II. a. In her., having only two leaves.

dufrénite (du-fren'it), n. [From the French mineralogist P. A. Dufrénoy (1792-1857).] A native hydrous iron phosphate, generally massive with radiated fibrous structure. It has a dark-green color, but changes on exposure to yellow or brown.

dufrénoyite (du-fre-nol'zit), n. (< Dufrénoy (see duf) + -ite). A sulphid of arsenic and lead, found in small prismatic crystals of a lead-gray color in the dolomite of the Binnenthal, Switzerland; named for the French mineralogist P. A. Dufrénoy.

duge (dug), n. [Early mod. E. dugge; cf. E. dial. ducky, ducky, the female breast; prob. ult. connected with Sw. dägga = Dan. dagge, suckle. See dairy, degl.] The pap or nipple of a woman or a female animal; the breast, with reference to suckling. It is now applied to that of a human female only in contempt.

It was a faithless squire that was the source Of all my sorrow, and of these sad tears,
 With whom, from tender days of common nurture
 At once I was up brought.
 Spencer, F. Q.
 She wildly breaketh from their strict embrace,
 Like a milk doe, whose swelling duge do ache,
 Heaving to feed her fawn hid in some brake.
 Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 875.

duge (dug), n. Preterit and past participle of dig.
duhong (du'gong), n. [Also duyong; < Malay duyong, Javanese duyung.] A large aquatic herbivorous mammal of the order Sirenia, Halicore dugong, of the Indian seas. In general configuration it resembles a cetacean, having a tapering fish-like body ending in flukes like a whale's, with two fore flippers and no hind limbs. It is known to attain a length of 7 or 8 feet, and is said to be sometimes much longer. The flesh is edible, and not unlike beef. Other products of the dugong are leather, ivory, and oil. The dugong and the manatee, of the old and new world respectively, are the best-known sirenia, and leading living representatives of the order Sirenia (which see). They may have contributed to the myth of the mermaid. See Halicore.

dugon (dug'ant), n. 1. A boat consisting of a log with the interior dug out or hollowed. It is a common form of the primitive canoe.

Our boat was a very unmade dug-out with no out-riggers, to which we could not dare to beguile a part of the way to sleep, for fear of capsizing it by an unguarded move ment.
 H. O. Forbes, Eastern Archipelago, p. 284.

The sun was just rising, as a man stepped from his slender dug-out and drew half its length out upon the very bank of a pretty bay.
 O. W. Cable, The Century, XXXV, 30.

2. A shelter or rough kind of house excavated in the ground, or more generally in the face of a bluff or bank. Whole dugouts are entirely excavated; half dugouts are partly excavated and partly built of logs. The latter kind is frequently used in Montana for dwellings; the whole dugouts are chiefly built for storing the crops and other things and as a refuge from cyclones and tornadoes. [Western U. S.]

The small outlying camps are often tents or more dug-outs in the ground. T. Roosevelt, The Century, XXXV, 498.
 People must resort to dug-outs and cellar caves.
 Jour. Franklin Inst., CXXI, 250

Dugungus, n. [NL. (Tiedmann), < dugong, q. v.] A genus of sirenians; same as Halicore. Also called Platystomus.

dug-way (dug'wä), n. A way dug along a precipitous place otherwise impassable; a road constructed for the passage of vehicles on the side of a very steep hill, along a bold river-front, etc. [Western U. S.]

dui- [Accom. form of Skt. dui (= E. two), < du = L. duo = E. two; noting a supposed second following element.] A prefix attached to the name of a chemical element and forming with it a provisional name for a hypothetical element, which, according to the periodic system of Mendelejeff, should have such properties as to stand in the same group with the element to which the prefix is attached and next but one to it. For instance, dui fluorine is the name of a supposed element not yet discovered, belonging in the same group as fluorine and separated from it in the group by manganese.

Dujardinia (du-jär-din'i-ä), n. [NL., named after Dujardin.] A genus of chetopodous annelids, of the family Syllidae.

duke (duk), n. (< ME. duke, duke, duk, duc, duke, duke, < OF. duc, ducs, dux, F. duc = Sp. duque = It. duca (Venetian doge; see doge) = MGr. duxi; < L. dux (duc), a leader, general, ML. a duke, < L. duces, lead; see duct. Cf. G. herzog = D. herzog = Dan. herzog = Sw. hertig, a duke; = AS. heretoga, a general, lit. 'army-leader'; the second element (< -zog, AS. -topi) being ult. akin to L. dux, as above. Cf. duchess, duchy, ducat, etc.) 1. A chief; a prince; a commander; a leader; as, "the duke of Edom," Ex. xv, 15.

"What lord art thou?" quoth Lucifer, a voys aloud seyde.
 "The lord of myght and of mayne, that made alle thynges."
 Duke of this dynasty place, a new vnde the gates.
 Piers Plowman (C), xvi, 265.

With yune the Cite were byrnt n on defensible, that of the Duke made grete joye when the hym sang.
 Meville, E. I. 4, B, 188.

Hannibal, duke of Carthage. See T. Rhod.

2. In Great Britain, France, Italy, Spain, and Portugal, a hereditary title of nobility, ranking next below that of prince, but in some instances a sovereign title, as in those of the dukes of Burgundy, Normandy, Lorraine, etc. (see duke, duke's), or borne as his distinguishing title by a prince of the blood royal. The first English duke was Edward the Black Prince, created Duke of Cornwall in 1337. Dukes, when British peers, sit in the House of Lords by right of birth. Scotch and Irish dukes have a right of election to it, in common with other peers of those countries, in certain proportions. In other countries, except Germany (see below), the title conveys no prescriptive political power. In Great Britain a duke's coronet consists of a richly chased gold circlet, having on its upper edge eight strawberry leaves, with or without a cap of crimson velvet, closed at the top with a gold tassel, lined with silver net, and turned up with ermine.

His grandfather was Lionel duke of Clarence.
 Third son to the third Edward king of England.
 Shak., 1 Hen VI, II, 4.

Next in rank (to the sovereign) among the lords temporal were the dukes. Stubbs, Const. Hist., I, 478.

3. A sovereign prince, the ruler of a state called a duchy. In the middle ages, on the continent of Europe, all dukes were hereditary territorial rulers, generally in subordination to a king or an emperor, though often independent; now only German dukes retain that status and of these there are but five, those of Anhalt, Brunswick, Saxe-Altenburg, Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, and Saxe-Meiningen. Mod. d. and Parma, in Italy, were ruled by sovereign dukes until their incorporation with the kingdom of Italy in 1846.

4. A name of the great eagle-owl of Europe, Bubo maximus, called grand-duc by the French. — 5. pl. The fluke. [Slang.] Duke of Exeter's daughter. See brake, 12. — Duke palatine. See pala.
 Now — To dine with Duke Humphrey. See dine.

duke (duk), v. t.; pret. and pp. duked, ppr. duking. (< duke, n.) To play the duke. [Rare.]

Lord Angelo dukes it well in his absence.
 Shak., M. for M., III, 2.

duke, n. A dialectal (Scotch) form of duck.

Three days in dub among the dukes
 He did with dirt him hyde.
 Beaumont and Fletcher, 1 Hen VI, v, 1.

dukedom (duk'dum), n. (< duke + -dom). 1. The jurisdiction, territory, or possessions of a duke.

Is not a dukedom, sir, a goodly gift?
 Shak., 1 Hen VI, v, 1.

Edward III founded the dukedom of Cornwall as the perpetual dignity of the king's eldest son and heir apparent.
 Stubbs, Const. Hist., I, 478.

2. The rank or quality of a duke.

dukeling (duk'ling), n. (< duke + -ling). A petty, mean, insignificant, or mock duke.

This dukeling mushroom Hath doubtless charmed the king.
 Ford, Perkin Warbeck, II, 3.

dukely (duk'li), a. (< duke + -ly). Becoming a duke. [Slang.]

dukery (du'kë-ri), n.; pl. dukeries (-iz). (< duke + -ery). A ducal territory, or a duke's seat; as, the Dukeries (a group of ducal seats in Nottinghamshire, England). Ducies. [Humorous.]

The Albertine line, electoral though it now was, made apauques, subdivisions, unintelligible little dukies and dukeries of a similar kind.
 Currier, Misc., IV, 280.

England is not a dukery. Nineteenth Century.

dukeship (duk'ship), n. (< duke + -ship). The state or dignity of a duke.

Will your dukeship
 Sit down and eat some sugar-plums?
 Massinger, Great Duke of Florence, IV, 2.

duke's-meat, n. Same as duck-meat.

dukeess, n. [ME. dukes, a var. of duches; see duchess.] A duchess.

Dukhoborts (dû-kô-bôrt'si), n. pl. [Russ. dukhobortsy, pl. dukhoborts, one who wrestling against the Holy Ghost (dukhoboratsa, a sect of such persons), < dukhin, spirit (Negativ Dukha, Holy Ghost), < boratsa, a contender, wrestler, < borati, overcome, roll, contend, wrestle, fight.] A fanatical Russian sect founded in the early part of the eighteenth century by a soldier named Procopius Iouppin, who pretended to make known the true spirit of Christianity, then long lost. They have no sacred places of worship, observe no holy days, reject the use of images and all rites and ceremonies, have no ordained clergy, and do not acknowledge the divinity of Christ or the authority of the Scriptures, to which they owe, in so far as they accept them, a mystical interpretation. They were removed to the Caucasus in 1861 and subsequent years. As a result of Russian oppression, over seven thousand of them migrated to Canada in 1890.

dulcamara (dul-ka-mä'ra), n. [= F. doucoumère = Sp. dulcamara, dulcamara, < Pg. It. dulcamara, < NL. dulcamara, lit. bitter-sweet, < L. dulcis, sweet, + amarus, bitter.] A pharmaceutical name for the bitter-sweet, Solanum Dulcamara, a common hedge-plant through Europe and the Mediterranean region, and naturalized in the United States. The root and twigs have a peculiar bitter-sweet taste, and have been used in decoction for the cure of diseases of the skin.

dulcamarin (dul-ka-mä'rin), n. [= F. dulcamarine; as dulcamara + -in.] A glucoside obtained from the Solanum Dulcamara or bitter-sweet, forming a yellow, transparent, resinous mass, readily soluble in alcohol, sparingly so in ether, and very slightly soluble in water.

dulcarnon, n. A word occurring in the phrase to be at dulcarnon—that is, to be at a loss, to be uncertain what course to take. It is found in the following passage from Chaucer:

"I am, til that me be to mynde wende,
 At dulcarnon, right at my wylow ende.
 And Pandarus, "Ye, yee, will ye here?
 I am at dulcarnon, for wretched he thought I was,
 For very hard, or other wylful teches."
 Trivulz, III, 931.

Dulcarnon represents the Arabic dhu 'l-karnayn 'lord of the two horns' a name applied to Alexander, either because he located himself the son of Jupiter Ammon and therefore had his coins stamped with horned images, or, as some say, because he had in his power the eastern and western world, signified in the two horns. (Golden's Preface to Dryden's Polyolbion.) But the epithet was also applied to the 47th proposition of Euclid, in which the squares of the two sides of the right angled triangle stand out something like two horns. This proposition was confounded by Chaucer with the 4th proposition, the famous pons asinorum. This, for some reason, was in the middle ages termed Plafaga, which is explained as meaning "flight of the miserable," or, as Chaucer renders it, "dumyng of wrecches." It was supposed to be derived from elagi, meaning miserable, and this latter was itself derived from eleghis, meaning sorrow. The passage from Chaucer was first thus explained in the London Athenaeum, Sept. 24, 1871, p. 383.

dulce (duls), a. and n. [Altered to suit the orig. L.; early mod. E. douler, earlier douce, < ME. douce, dance, sweet, < L. dulcis, sweet; see douce.] I. a. Sweet; pleasant; soothing.

Nevertheless with much dulce and gentle forms they make their reason as violent and as vehement one against the other as they may ordinarily.

Quoted in Stubbs's Const. Hist., § 413.

II. n. Sweet wine; must. See the extract.

Sweetness is imparted by the addition of "dulse,"—that is, must, frequently made from grapes dried for some days in the sun. Enc. Dict., IV. 939.

dulcet, v. t. [dulce, a.] To make sweet; render pleasant; soothe.

Reverus . . . (because he would not leave an enemy behind at his back) . . . wisely and with good foresight dulceth and kindly intreateth the men.

Holland, tr. of Candide's Britain, p. 68.

dulceness (duls'nēs), n. [dulce*, a. (see douce, a.); < L. dulcis, sweet, + -ness.] Sweetness; pleasantness.

Too much dulceness, goodness, and facility of nature.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 334.

dulcet (dul'set), a. and n. [Altered, after L. dulcis, from ME. doucet, sweet, < OF. doucet, F. doucet (= Fr. doucet, doucet), dim. of doux, fem. douce, < L. dulcis, sweet. Cf. doucet.] I. a. 1. Sweet to the sense, especially of taste; luscious; exquisite; also, melodious; harmonious.

Dainty lays and dulcet melody. Spenser.

Anon out of the earth a fabric huge Rose, like an exhalation, with the sound
Of dulcet symphonies and voices sweet.

Milton, P. L., l. 712.

So mild and dulcet as the flesh of young pigs.

Lamb, Roast Pig.

2. Agreeable to the mind.

They have . . . styled poetry a dulcet and gentle philosophy. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

II. n. The sweetbread.

These stagg upbreking they slit to the dulcet or luche. Stanhurst, Eccl., l. 218.

lulcetness (dul'set-nēs), n. Sweetness.

Be it so that there were no commodities mingled with the commodities; yet as I before have said, the brevity and short time that we have to use them should manage their dulcetness.

J. Bradford, Writings (Parker Soc.), I. 338.

lulciant, n. [= Dan. Sw. dulcian = OF. douçaine, douçaine, douçaine, also douçaine, douçaine, a flute, < Sp. dulciana = Pg. dulciana, dogaña, dogaña, < ML. dulciana, a kind of bassoon, < L. dulcis, sweet; see dulce.] A small bassoon.

lulciana (dul'si-an'i), n. [ML., a kind of bassoon: see dulcian.] In organ-building, a stop having metal pipes of small scale, and giving thin, incisive, somewhat string-like tones. The word was formerly applied to a reed stop of delicate tone. See dulcian. Also called dolcan.

lulcification (dul'si-n-kä'shon), n. [= F. dulcification = Sp. dulcificación = Pg. dulcificação = It. dolcificazione, < L. as if dulcificatio* (n), < dulcificare, sweeten; see dulcify.] The act of sweetening; the act of freeing from acidity, saltiness, or acrimony. E. Phillips, 1706.

lulciferous (dul'si-fē-us), a. [dulciferus*, < L. dulcis, sweet, + -ferus, flow.] Flowing sweetly. Bailey, 1727.

lulcify (dul'si-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. dulcified, ppr. dulcifying. [dulcifyer*, < L. dulcificare, sweeten, < L. dulcis, sweet, + ferere, make.]

1. To sweeten; in old chemistry, to free from corrosive and sharp-tasting admixtures; render more agreeable to the taste.

Can you sublime and dulcify calcine?

B. Jonson, Alchemist, II. 1.

Other beneficial inventions peculiarly his; such as the dulcifying sea water with that case and plenty.

Resyn, To Mr. Wotton.

2. To render more agreeable in any sense.

His harshest tones in this part came steeped and dulcified in good humour. Lamb, Artificer (Comedy).

Dulcified spirit, a compound of alcohol with mineral acids: see dulcified spirits of water.

lulciloquy (dul'si-lō-kwi), n. [= Pg. It. dulciloquio, It. also dolciloquio, < LL. dulciloquus, sweetly speaking, < L. dulcis, sweet, + loqui, speak.] A soft manner of speaking. Bailey, 1731.

dulcimelt, n. An obsolete form of dulcimer.

dulcimer (dul'si-mēr), n. [Formerly also dulcimel (after Sp. and It.); < OF. doulcemer (Roquefort), < Sp. dulcemele = It. dolcemele, a musical instrument, < L. dulce melos, a sweet song; dulce, neut. of dulcis, sweet; melos, < Gr. μήλος, a song; see melody.] 1. A musical instrument consisting of a body shaped like a trapezium, over which are stretched a number of metallic strings, having a compass—sometimes diatonic, sometimes chromatic—of from 2 to 3 octaves. The tones are produced by striking the strings with hammers, the heads of which have both hard and soft sides, so that different qualities and degrees of force are possible. The dulcimer is a very ancient instrument. It is specially notable because it was the prototype of the pianoforte, which is essentially a keyed dulcimer—that is, a dulcimer whose hammers are operated by keys or levers. The immediate precursor of the pianoforte, however, the harpsichord, was a keyed psalter. See harpsichord, psalter, pianoforte.

Here, among the fiddlers, I first saw a dulcimer played on with sticks knocking of the strings, and is very pretty. Pepper, Diary, I. 283.

It was an Abyssinian maid,
And on her dulcimer she played, Chorded by Khubla Khan.

2. A kind of woman's bonnet.

With bonnet trimmed and bonneted withal,
Which they a dulcimer do call.

Warton, High Street Tragedy.

dulcin (dul'sin), n. [dulcis*, sweet, + -in.] Same as dulcitol.

dulciness (dul'si-nēs), n. [dulce* + -y + -ness.] Softness; easiness of temper. Bacon.

Dulcinist (dul'si-nist), n. [dulcis*, sweet, + -nist.] A follower of Dulcinus or Dolcino (born at Novara, Italy; burned alive in 1307), a leader of the Apostolic Brethren of northern Italy. With that sect, the Dulcinists rejected the authority of the pope, oaths, marriage, capital punishment, and all rites and ceremonies. They held that all law and all rights of property should be abolished, and that the rite of marriage should be superseded by a merely spiritual and celibate union of man and wife.

dulcitamine (dul'si-am'in), n. [dulcite* + -amine.] In chem., a compound of dulcitol with ammonia, having the formula $(C_6H_{12}(OH)_5NH_2)_3$.

dulcitan (dul'si-tan), n. [dulcite* + -an.] The anhydride of dulcitol ($C_6H_{12}O_5$), an alcohol prepared by heating dulcitol.

dulcite (dul'si-tē), n. [dulcis*, sweet, + -ite.] Same as dulcitol.

dulcitol (dul'si-tol), n. [dulcite* + -ol.] A saccharine substance ($C_6H_{14}O_6$), similar to and isomeric with mannitol, which occurs in various plants, and is commercially obtained from an unknown plant in Madagascar, and in the crude state is called Madagascar manna. Also called dulcite, dulcin, dulcrose.

dulcitude (dul'si-tud), n. [dulcitus*, sweet, < dulcis, sweet; see dulce, douce.] Sweetness. E. Phillips, 1706.

dulcorate (dul'kō-rāt), v. t. [dulcoratus*, pp. of dulcorare, sweeten, < dulcor, sweetness, < L. dulcis, sweet; see dulce.] To sweeten; make less acrimonious.

The ancients, for the dulcoration of fruit, do commend swine dung above all other dung.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 105.

dulia (dū'li-ä), n. [ML. < Gr. δούλια, service, servitude, < δούλος, a slave.] An inferior kind of worship paid to saints and angels in the Roman Catholic Church. Also duly, doulia.

Catholic theologians distinguish three kinds of cultus. Latris, or supreme worship, is due to God alone, and cannot be transferred to any creature without the horrible sin of idolatry. Dulia is that secondary veneration which Catholics give to saints and angels as the servants and special friends of God. Lastly, hyperlatris, which is only a subdivision of dulia, is that higher veneration which we give to the Blessed Virgin as the most exalted of mortal creatures, though, of course, infinitely inferior to God, and incomparably inferior to Christ in his human nature.

Cath. Dict.

Dulichia (dū'lik-i-ä), n. [NL. < Gr. δούλια, Ionic form of δούλος, long; see Dolichos.] The typical genus of the family Dulichidae.

Kensley, Two Years Ago, Int.

duo (dū'ō), n. [It., a duet, also two, < L. duo = E. two.] The same as duet. A distinction is sometimes made by using duo for a two-part composition for two voices or instruments of the same kind, and duo for such a composition for two voices or instruments of different kinds.

[Lord's Day.] Up, and, while I staid for the barber, tried to compose a duo of counter point: and I think it will do very well, it being by Mr. Berkenlaugh's rule.

Pepys, Diary, II, 312.

duo-. [L. duo, duo, = Gr. duo, duo = E. two.] A prefix in words of Latin or Greek origin, meaning 'two.'

duodecahedral, duodecahedron (dū'ō-dē-kā'hē'drāl, -drōn). See duodecahedral, duodecahedron.

duodecennial (dū'ō-dē-sen'i-āl), a. [Cf. L. duodecim, of twelve years (< L. duodecim, twelve, + annus, a year), + -al.] Consisting of twelve years. Ask.

duodecimal (dū'ō-dē-sim'i-āl), a. and n. [Cf. L. duodecim (= Gr. duōdeka, duōdeka), twelve (< duo = E. two, < deceim = E. ten), + -al. Cf. duodecim, ult. < duodecim, and see decimal.] I. a. Relating by twelves and powers of twelve: as, duodecimal multiplication.

The duodecimal system in liquid measures, which is found elsewhere, appears to be derived from the Babylonians.

Van Ranke, Univ. Hist. (trans.), p. 10.

Duodecimal arithmetic or scale. See duodecimal arithmetic or scale, under duodecimal.

II. n. 1. One of a system of numerals the base of which is twelve.—2. pl. An arithmetical rule for ascertaining the number of square feet, twelfths of feet, and square inches in a rectangular area or surface whose sides are given in feet and inches and twelfths of inches. The feet of the multiplier are first multiplied into the feet, inches, and twelfths of the multiplicand, giving square feet, twelfths, and inches. The inches of the multiplier are then multiplied into the feet and inches of the multiplicand, giving twelfths of feet and square inches, and finally the twelfths of inches of the multiplier are multiplied into the feet of the multiplicand, giving square inches. These three partial products are then added together to get the product sought. It is used by artificers. Also called duodecimal or cross multiplication.

duodecimally (dū'ō-dē-sim'i-āl), adv. In a duodecimal manner; by twelves.

duodecimifid (dū'ō-dē-sim'i-fid), a. [Cf. L. duodecim, twelve, + -fidus, < findere, eleven, split (= E. find): see findum, etc.] Divided into twelve parts.

duodecimo (dū'ō-dē-sim'i-mō), n. and a. [Orig. in L. (NL.) phrase in duodecimo; in, prep., = E. in; duodecimo, abl. of duodecim, twelve, < duodecim, twelve.] I. n. 1. A size of page usually measuring, in the United States, about 5½ inches in width and 7½ inches in length, when the leaf is uncut, and corresponding to crown octavo of British publishers.—2. A book composed of sheets which, when folded, form twelve leaves of this size.—3. In music, the interval of a twelfth. E. D.

II. a. Consisting of sheets folded into twelve leaves; having leaves or pages measuring about 5½ by 7½ inches. Often written 12mo or 12o.

duodecimole (dū'ō-dē-sim'i-mō), n. [Cf. L. duodecim, twelve; see duodecimo.] In music, a group of twelve notes to be performed in the time of eight; a duodecuplet.

Duodecimpennate (dū'ō-dē-sim-i-pen-nā'tē), n. pl. [NL., < L. duodecim, twelve, + pennatus, winged, feathered.] In ornith., in Fundevall's system, a cohort of Gallinæ, composed of the American curassows and guans, Cracidae: so called from the 12 rectrices or tail-feathers. Also called Sylviaculæ.

duodecuple (dū'ō-dē-sim'i-pl), a. [Cf. duodecuple = Sp. duodecuplo = Pg. It. duodecuplo, < L. duo, = E. two, + decuplus, tenfold: see decuple and duodecimal.] Consisting of twelve.

duodena, n. Plural of duodenum.

duodenal (dū'ō-dē-nāl), a. [Cf. F. duodenal = Sp. Pg. duodenal = It. duodenale; as duodenum + -al.] Connected with or relating to the duodenum: as, "duodenal dyspepsia," Copland.—Duodenal fold, a special loop of duplication of the duodenum in which the pancreas is lodged in many animals, especially in birds, where it forms the most constant and characteristic folding of the intestine.—Duodenal glands. See gland.

duodenal (dū'ō-dē-nāl), a. and n. [Cf. duodena + -al.] I. a. Pertaining to a duodene.

II. n. In musical theory, the symbol of the root of a duodene.

duodenary (dū-ō-den'ā-rī), a. [= F. duodénario = Sp. Pg. It. duodenario, < L. duodénarius, containing twelve, < duodeni, twelve each, < duodecim, twelve.] Relating to the number twelve; twelvefold; increasing by twelves. Duodenary or duodecimal arithmetic or scale, that system in which the local value of the figures increases in a twelvefold proportion from right to left, instead of in the tenfold proportion of the common decimal arithmetic.

duodene (dū-ō-dēn), n. [< L. duodeni, twelve each: see duodenary. Cf. duodenum.] In musical theory, a group of twelve tones, having precise acoustical relations with one another, arranged so as to explain and correct problems in harmony and modulation. Any tone whatever may be chosen as the root, and its symbol is called a duodene. The root, the major third above, and the major third below it constitute the initial triad. The duodene consists of four such triads, one being the initial triad, one a perfect fifth below it, one a perfect fifth above it, and one two perfect fifths above it. The term and the process of analysis to which it belongs were first used by A. J. Ellis in England in 1874. The study of the process is incident to the attempt to secure just intonation (pure temperament) on keyed instruments of fixed pitch.

duodenitis (dū-ō-de-nī'tis), n. [< NL. < duodenum + -itis.] Inflammation of the duodenum.

duodenostomy (dū-ō-de-nōs'tō-mī), n. [< NL. duodenum, q. v., & Gr. stōma, mouth, opening.] The surgical formation of an external opening from the duodenum through the abdominal wall.

duodenum (dū-ō-dō-num), n.; pl. duodena (-nā). [< NL. (so called because in man it is about twelve finger-breadths long), < L. duodeni, twelve each: see duodenary.] 1. In anat., the first portion of the small intestine, in immediate connection with the stomach, receiving the hepatic and pancreatic secretions, and usually curved or folded about the pancreas. It extends from the pylorus to the beginning of the jejunum. In man it is from 10 to 12 inches in length. See cuts under alimentary and intestine.

2. In entom., a short smooth portion of the intestine, between the ventriculus and the ileum, found in a few coleopterous insects. Some entomologists, however, apply this name to the ventriculus.

duodrama (dū-ō-drā'mā), n. [= F. duodrame = It. duodramma, < L. duo, two (= Gr. duo = F. deux), + Gr. drama, a drama: see drama.] A dramatic or melodramatic piece for two performers only.

Man is a dupable animal. Southey, The Doctor, lxxvii.

duparted (dū-pār'ted), a. [< L. duo, = F. deux, + parted.] In her., same as duparted.

dupe (dūp), n. [< F. dupe, a dupe, < Gr. dupē, duppa, F. dial. dube, duppe, a hoopoe, a bird regarded as stupid: see hoopoe and duppa. For similar examples of the application of the names of (supposed) stupid birds to stupid persons, cf. booby, goose, gull, and (in Pg.) dodo. Cf. Bret. kouperik, a hoopoe, a dupe.] A person who is deceived; one who is led astray by false representations or conceptions; a victim of credulity: as, the dupe of a designing rogue; he is a dupe to his imagination.

First slave to words, then vassal to a name,
Then dupe to party; child and man the same.

Pope, Innocent, iv. 582.

He that hates truth shall be the dupe of lies Comper, Progress of Error.

When the spirit is not master of the world, then it is its dupe.
Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 229.

dupe (dūp), v. t.; pret. and pp. duped, ppr. duping. [< F. dupe, dupe, gull, take in; from the noun.] To deceive; trick; mislead by imposing on one's credulity: as, to dupe a person by flattery.

We've hav'n I duped him with base counterfeit.

Coleridge.

Instead of making civilization the friend of the poor, it [the theory of social equality] has duped the poor into making themselves the enemies of civilization.
W. H. Mallock, Social Equality, p. 211.

dupeability, dupeable. See dupability, dupable.

duper (dū-pēr), n. [< dupe + -er; after OF. (and F.) dupeur, a deceiver.] One who dupes or deceives; a cheat; a swindler.

The race-ground had its customary complement of knaves and fools - the dupers and the duped.

Bulwer, Pathos, I. xii.

dupery (dū-pēr-i), n. [< F. duperie, < dupe, a dupe: see dupe, n.] The art of deceiving or imposing upon the credulity of others; the ways or methods of a dupe.

Travelling from town to town in the full practice of dupery and wheedling. I. J. Israel, Amn. of Lit., I. 304.

It might be hard to see an end to the inquiry were we once to set diligently to work to examine and set forth how much innocent dupery we habitually practice upon ourselves in the region of metaphysics.

Maudsley, Body and Will, p. 23.

dupion, doupion (dū'-, dō'-pi-on), n. [< F. dupion, < It. doppione, ang. of doppio, double, < L. duplus, double: see double, and also doublon and dobruo, doublets of dupion.] 1. A double cocoon formed by two silkworms spinning together. 2. The coarse silk furnished by such double cocoons.

duplication (dū-plā'shon), n. [< L. duplus, double, + -ation.] Multiplication by two; doubling.

duple (dū-pl), a. [= Sp. Pg. It. duplo, < L. duplus, double: see double, the old form.] Double. [Rare in general use.]

A competent defence of Hylicum was upon a two-fold reason established, the dupla greatness of which bled the emperor having taken in hand afflicting both.

Holland, tr. of Ammianus, p. 101.

Duple ratio, a ratio such as that of 2 to 1, 8 to 4, etc. Subduple ratio is the reverse, or as 1 to 2, 4 to 8, etc.

Duple rhythm, in music, a rhythm characterized by two beats or pulses to the measure; double time.

duple (dū-pl), v. t.; pret. and pp. dupled, ppr. dupling. [< dupl, a.] To double. [Rare.]

duplet (dū-plet), n. [< L. duplus, double, + F. dim. -et.] A doublet. [Rare.]

That is to throw three dice till duplets and a chance be thrown, and the highest duplet wins.

Dryden, Mock Astrologer, iii.

duplex (dū-pleks), a. and n. [< L. duplex, double, twofold, < duo, = F. deux, + plicare, fold.] 1. a. Double; twofold. Specifically applied in electricity to a system of telegraphy in which two messages are transmitted at the same time over a single wire; it includes both duplex and contraplex. See these words. — Duplex escapement of a watch. See escapement. — Duplex idea, lathe, pelitti. See the nouns. — Duplex querela (querēla), a double quarrel (which see, under querrel).

II. n. A doubling or duplicating.

duplex (dū-pleks), v. [< duplex, a.] 1. trans. In teleg., to arrange (a wire) so that two messages may be transmitted along it at the same time.

Four perfectly independent wires were practically created. Each of these wires was also duplexed.

W. H. Preece, Elect. Invent., p. 219.

II. intrans. To transmit telegraphic messages by the duplex system.

duplicate (dū-plī-kāt), v.; pret. and pp. duplicated, ppr. duplicating. [< L. duplicatus, pp. of duplicare, make double, < duplex (dupl), double, twofold: see duplex. Cf. double, v.] 1. trans. 1. To double; repeat; produce a second (like the first); make a copy or copies of.

Whereof perhaps one reason is, because there is shown in this a duplicated power: a contrary stream of power running across and thwart. In its effects in this.

Goedwin, Works, III. i. 568.

2. In physiol., to divide into two by natural growth or spontaneous division: as, some infusorians duplicate themselves.

II. intrans. To become double; repeat or be repeated; specifically, in ecclesiastical use, to celebrate the mass or holy communion twice in the same day. See duplication.

The desires of man, if they pass through an even and different life towards the issues of an ordinary and necessary course, they are little, and within command; but if they pass upon an end or aim of difficulty or ambition, they duplicate, and grow to a disturbance.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 104.

If the Priest has to duplicate, i. e., to celebrate twice in one day, he must not drink the ablutions, which must be poured into a chalice and left for him to consume at the second celebration. For to drink the ablutions would be to break his fast.

F. G. Lee, Directorium Anglicanum, 4th ed. (1878), p. 214.

duplicate (dū-plī-kāt), a. and n. [= It. duplicato = D. duplicaat = G. Dan. duplicat, < L. duplicatus, pp. of duplicare, make double: see duplicate, v.] 1. a. 1. Double; twofold; consisting of or relating to a pair or pairs, or to two corresponding parts: as, duplicate spines in an insect; duplicate examples of an ancient coin; duplicate proportion. — 2. Consisting of a double number or quantity; multiplied by two.

The estates of Bruges little doubted to admit so small a number into so populous a company, yea though the number were duplicate.

Hall, Hon. VII., an. 5.

3. Exactly like or corresponding to something made or done before; repeating an original; matched: as, there are many duplicate copies of this picture; a duplicate action or proceeding. — Duplicate proportion or ratio, the proportion or ratio of squares: thus, in geometrical proportion, the first term is said to be to the third in the duplicate ratio of the first to the second, or as its square is to the square of the second. Thus, in 9:15::16:25, the ratio of 9 to 25 is a duplicate of that of 3 to 5, or as the square of 3 is to the square of 5, also, the duplicate ratio of a to b is the ratio of *a*² to *b*².

II. n. 1. One of two or more things corresponding in every respect to each other.

Of all these he [Vertue] made various sketches and notes, always presenting a duplicate of his observations to Lord Oxford.

Walpole, Life of Vertue.

Specifically, in law and com.: (a) An instrument or writing corresponding in every particular to a first or original and of equal validity with it; an additional original.

Duplicates of dispatches and of important letters are frequently sent by another conveyance, as a precaution against the risk of a miscarriage. The copy which first reaches its destination is treated as an original. Wharton.

In the case of mutual contracts, such as leases, contracts of marriage, copartnership, and the like, duplicates of the deed are frequently prepared, each of which is signed by all the contracting parties; and, where this is done, the parties are bound if one of the duplicates be regularly executed, although the other should be defective in the necessary solemnities.

Bell.

(b) A second copy of a document, furnished by authority when the original has been lost, defaced, or invalidated.

2. One of two or more things each of which corresponds in all essential respects to an original, type, or pattern; another corresponding to a first or original; another of the same kind; a copy; as, a duplicate of a hunt.

Many duplicates of the General's wagon stand about the church in every direction.

W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 72.

duplication (dū-plī-kā shon), n. [= F. duplicatio = Pr. duplicatio = Sp. duplicacion = Pg. duplicação = It. duplicazione, < L. duplicatio (n.), < duplicare, pp. duplicatus, double: see duplicate, v.] 1. The act of duplicating, or of making or repeating something essentially the same as something previously existing or done.

However, if two sheriffs appear in one year (as at this time and frequently hereafter), such duplications cometh to pass by one of these accidents.

Fuller, Worthies, Berkshire.

2. In arith., the multiplication of a number by two. — 3. A folding; a doubling; also, a fold: as, the duplication of a membrane. — 4. In physiol., the act or process of dividing into two by natural growth or spontaneous division. — 5. In music, the process or act of adding the upper or lower octaves or replicates to the tones of a melody or harmony. See double, a. and v. — 6. In bot., same as clorosis. — 7. In admiralty law, a pleading on the part of the defendant in reply to the replication. Benodict. [Rare.] — 8. Eccles., the celebration of the mass or eucharist twice by the same priest on the same day. From the sixth century to the thirteenth, duplication was in many places not an unusual practice on a number of days. Since the fourteenth century it has been forbidden in the Roman Catholic Church except on Christmas day. In the medieval church in England it was allowed on Easter day also. The Greek Church does not permit duplication. — Duplication formula, in math., a formula for obtaining the area, etc., of the double of an angle from the functions of the angle itself.—Problem of the duplication, or duplication of the cube, in math., the problem to determine the side of a cube which shall have double the solid contents of a given cube. The problem is equivalent to finding the cube root of 2, which is neither rational nor rationally expressible in terms of square roots of integers; consequently neither an exact numerical solution nor an exact construction with a rule and compass is possible. Also called the Delian problem.

There remain yet some other pages of Mr. Hobbes's dialogue, wherein he speaks of . . . the duplication of the cube, and the quadrature of the circle.

Boyle, Works, I. 234.

The altar of Apollo at Athens was a square block, or cube, and to double it required the duplication of the cube. D. Webster, Speech, Mechanics Inst., Nov. 12, 1828.

duplicative (dū'pli-kā-tiv), a. [= F. duplicatif; as duplicite + -ive.] Having the quality of duplicating or doubling; especially, in physiol., having the quality of duplicating or dividing into two by natural growth or spontaneous division.

In the lowest forms of Vegetable life, the primordial germ multiplies itself by duplicative subdivision into an apparently unlimited number of cells. W. K. Carpenter, In Grove's Corr. of Forces.

duplicatopectinate (dū'pli-kā-tō-pek'ti-nāt), a. [< duplicare + pectinate.] In entom., having the branches of bipectinate antennae on each side alternately long and short.

duplicate (dū'pli-kā-tur), n. [= F. duplication; as duplicare, *< L. as if duplicatura, < duplicare, pp. duplicatus, double; see duplicate, v.] A doubling; a fold or folding; a duplication: as, a duplicate of the peritoneum.

The kidneys and bladder are contained in a distinct duplication of that membrane (the peritoneum), being thereby partitioned off from the other contents of the abdomen. Paley, Nat. Theol., xi.

duplicitate (dū'pli-si-den'tāt), a. [< NL. duplicitas, < L. duplex (duplex), double, < dentatus = E. toothed; see dentate.] Of or pertaining to the Duplicatati; having four upper incisors, two of which are much smaller than and situated behind the other two, of which they thus appear like duplicates, as in the hare, rabbit, or pika. Coues.

Duplicatati (dū'pli-si-den'tā-ti), n. pl. [< NL. (see Gliræ), orig. Duplicatata (see Rodentia, Illiger, 1811); pl. of duplicitatus; see duplicitatus.] A prime division of the order Rodentia or Gliræ, containing those rodents, as the hares and pikas, which have four upper front teeth—that is, twice as many as ordinary rodents, or Simplicatati. The group consists of the families Leporidae and Lagomyidae. F. R. Alston.

duplicity (dū'plis-i-ti), n. [< ME. duplicité, < OF. duplicité, F. duplicité = Sp. duplicitad = Pg. duplicidade = It. duplicità, < L. duplex (duplex), doubleness, ML. ambiguity, < L. duplex (duplex), twofold, double; see duplex.] 1. The state of being double; doubleness. [Rare.]

They neither acknowledge a multitude of unmade delicacies, nor yet that duplicity of them which Plutarch contended for (one good and the other evil). Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 293.

These intermediate examples need not in the least confuse our generally distinct ideas of the two families of buildings; the one in which the substance is alike throughout, and the forms and conditions of the ornament assume or prove that it is so; . . . and the other, in which the substance is of two kinds, one internal the other external, and the system of decoration is founded on this duplicity, as pre-eminently in St. Mark's. I have used the word duplicity in no depreciatory sense. Ruskin.

A star in the Northern Crown, . . . (γ Corone), was found to have completed more than one entire circuit since its first discovery; another, ε Serpentarii, had closed up into apparent singleness; while in a third, ζ Orionis, the converse change had taken place, and deceptive singleness had been transformed into obvious duplicity. A. M. Clerke, Astron. in 19th Cent., p. 58.

2. Doubleness of heart or speech; the acting or speaking differently in relation to the same thing at different times or to different persons, with intention to deceive; the practice of deception by means of dissimulation or double-dealing.

And shall we even now, whilst we are yet smarting from the consequences of her treachery, become a second time the good easy dupes of her duplicity? Anecdotes of Dr. Watson, I. 273.

I think the student of their character should also be slow to upbraid Italians for their duplicity without admitting, in palliation of the faults, facts of long ages of alien and domestic oppression, in politics and religion. Howells, Venetian Life, xxi.

3. In law, the pleading of two or more distinct matters together as if constituting but one.—Syn. 2. Guile; deception, hypocrisy, artifice, chicanery.

duplo (dū'plō), [< L. duplus, double; see double.] A prefix signifying 'twofold' or 'twice as much': as, duplo-carburet, twofold carburet. duply (dū'pli), n.; pl. duples (-pliz'). [*< duply, v. (on type of reply, < OF. replier), *< OF. as if duplier, F. only dupliquer = Sp. Pg. duplicar = It. duplicare, < ML. duplicare, put in a rebutter, make a second reply, L. duplicare, double; see duplicate, a.] In Scots law, a second reply: a pleading formerly in use in inferior courts.

Answers, replies, duples, triplies, quadruples, followed thick upon each other. Scott, Abbot, I.

dupondius (dū'pon-di-us), n.; pl. dupondii (-i). [< L. also dupondium, dupondium, < dup, = F. two, + pondus, a weight, < pendere, weigh; see pound.] A Roman bronze coin, of the value of 2 assen (see as), issued by Augustus and some of his successors; popularly called by coin-collectors "second brass," to distinguish it from the sestertius, the "first brass" Roman coin.

Obverse. Reverse.

dupper (dū'pēr), n. Same as dubber 2.

Dupuytren's contraction. See contraction.

dur (dūr), n. [= G. Dur, Sw. dur, < L. durus, hard.] In music, major; as, C dur, or C major.

dura (dū'rā), n. [< NL. fem. of L. durus, hard; see dure.] 1. Same as duramen.—2. The dura mater (which see). Wilder and Gage.

durability (dū'rā-bil'i-ti), n. [= Dan. Sw. durabilitet, < F. durabilité (OF. durabilité) = Pr. durabilitat = Pg. durabilidade = It. durabilità, < L. durabilitas (-is), < L. durabilis, durable; see durable.] The quality of being durable; the power of lasting or continuing in the same state by resistance to causes of decay or dissolution.

A Gothic cathedral raises its astounding in our minds by its size, its height, . . . its durability. H. Blair, Rhetoric, III.

durable (dū'rā-bl), a. [= Dan. Sw. durabel, < F. durable = Pr. Sp. durable = Pg. durável = It. durabile, < L. durabilis, lasting, < durare, last, < durus, hard, lasting; see dure, v.] Having the quality of lasting, or continuing long in being; not perishable or changeable; lasting; enduring: as, durable timber; durable cloth; durable happiness.

The monuments of wit and learning are more durable than the monuments of power, or of the hands. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, I. 101.

They might take up their cross and follow the second Adam unto a durable happiness. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 26.

For time, though in eternity applied To motion, measures all things durable By present, past, and future. Milton, P. L., v. 581.

The very susceptibility that makes him quick to feel makes him also incapable of deep and durable feeling. Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 364.

durableness (dū'rā-bl-ness), n. The quality of being lasting or enduring; durability: as, the durableness of honest fame.

As for the timber of the walnut tree, it may be termed an English shutting wood for the firmness, smoothness, and durability thereof. Fuller, Worthies, Surrey.

The durableness of metals is the foundation of this extraordinary steadiness of price. Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, I. 11.

durably (dū'rā-bl), adv. In a lasting manner; with long continuance.

An error in physical speculations is seldom productive of such consequences, either to one's ingenuity or one's self, as are deeply, durably, or extensively injurious. F. Knor, Essays, I.

dural (dū'ral), a. [< dura (mater) + -al] Of or pertaining to the dura mater.

The dural vessels were well injected externally and internally. Medical News, I 11, 430.

dura mater (dū'rā mā'tēr), [< NL. L. dura, fem. of durus, hard; mater, mother; see dure, mother, and cf. dura.] The outermost membranous envelop or external meninx of the brain and spinal cord; a dense, tough, glistening fibrous membrane which lines the interior of the brain-case, but in the spinal column is separated from the peritoneum lining the vertebrae by a space filled with loose areolar tissue. In the skull it envelops the brain, but does not send down processes into the fissures. It forms, however, some main folds, as the vertical falx, sheet of falx cerebri between the hemispheres of the cerebrum, and the tentorium or horizontal sheet between the cerebrum and the cerebellum. Sundry venous channels between layers of the dura mater are the sinuses of the brain. The term dura mater is contrasted with pia mater, both these meanings being as named from an old fanciful notion that they were the "mothers," or at least the nurses, of the contained parts.

duramen (dū'rā'men), n. [< NL. L. duramen, hardness, also applied to a ligneous vine-branch, < durare, harden, < durus, hard; see dure.] In bot., the central wood or heart-wood in the trunk of an exogenous tree. It is harder and more solid than the newer wood that surrounds it, from the formation of secondary layers of cellulose in the wood-cells. It is also usually of a deeper color, owing to the presence of peculiar coloring matters. Called by ship carpenters the spine. See alburnum. Also durm.

The inner layers of wood, being not only the oldest, but the most solidified by matters deposited within their component cells and vessels, are spoken of collectively under the designation duramen or "heart wood." W. B. Carpenter, Microsc., p. 260.

durance (dū'rāns), n. [Early mod. E. also durance, durance; < OF. durance = Sp. duranza = It. duranza, *< ML. as if durantia, < L. durans (-s), pp. of durare, last; see dure, v.] In E. durance is prob. in part an abbr. by aphoresis of endurance, q. v.] 1. Duration; continuance; endurance. [Obsolete or archaic.]

It is a definite compound, ethylene dichloride (C₂H₄Cl₂), formed by mixing ethylene or olefiant gas and chlorine. It also occurs as a by-product in the manufacture of chloral. — Dutch metal, one of the alloys used as a cheap imitation of gold, and sold in the form of leaves, called Dutch leaf or leaf gold. It is a kind of brass, containing 11 parts of copper to 2 of zinc, and is one of the most malleable of alloys. It is cast in thin plates and then rolled, and afterward beaten into very thin leaves. It is used in bookbinding. — Dutch myrtle, oven, pink. See the nouns. — Dutch pins. See pin. — Dutch roller, rush. See the nouns. — Dutch school, the name applied to a peculiar style of painting which attained its highest development in the Netherlands, characterized by the selection of subjects of a low or commonplace character, as bores drinking, butchers' shops, the materials of the hard or etc., but raised to the highest popularity by admirable imitation and general perfection of execution. Rembrandt, Brouwer, Ostade, and Jan Steen are among the best-known masters of this peculiar school. — Dutch syrup. See the extract.

A kind of syrup called colonial-syrup or Dutch-syrup is brought into commerce from those colonies where sugar is manufactured from sugar-cane.

Thausing, Beer (trans.), p. 217

Dutch talent (saat), any piece of nautical work which while it may answer the purpose, and even show a certain ingenuity, is not done in clever, shipshape style, defined by sailors as "main strength and stupidity." — Dutch tile. See tile. — Dutch white. See white. — Dutch wife, an open frame of rattan or cane, used in hot weather in the Dutch East Indies and other tropical countries to rest the arms and legs upon while in bed. — To talk like a Dutch knave, to talk with great but kindly severity and directness, as if with the authority and asseverating frankness of an uncle from whom one has expectations.

Milverton . . . began reasoning with the boys, talking to them like a Dutch uncle (I wonder what that expression means) about their errors.

Helps, Animals and their Masters, p. 181.

II. n. 1. The Teutonic or Germanic race; the German peoples generally: used as a plural. Specifically—2. The Low Germans, particularly the people of Holland, or the kingdom of the Netherlands; the Dutchmen; the Hollanders; called specifically the Low Dutch: used as a plural. — 3. The High Germans; the inhabitants of Germany; the Germans; formerly called specifically the High Dutch: used as a plural.

Germany is slandered to have sent none to this war [the Crusades] at this first voyage; and that other pilgrims, passing through that country, were mocked by the Dutch, and called fools for their pains.
Fulder.

4. The Teutonic or Germanic language, including all its forms. See 5, 6. — 5. The language spoken in the Netherlands; the Hollandish language (which differs very slightly from the Flemish, spoken in parts of the adjoining kingdom of Belgium): called distinctively Low Dutch. — 6. The language spoken by the Germans; German; High German: formerly, and still occasionally (as in the United States, especially where the two races are mingled), called distinctively High Dutch. — 7. The common white clover, Trifolium repens: an abbreviation of Dutch clover. — 8. [l. c.] A kind of linen tape. — Pennsylvania Dutch, a mixed dialect, consisting of German intermingled with English, spoken by the descendants of the original German settlers of Pennsylvania.

Piety or dutifulness to parents was a most popular virtue among the Romans.

Dryden.

duty (dū'ti), n.; pl. duties (-tiz). [Early mod. E. also duite, duette, duette, duette, < ME. duete, duete, duete, duete, etc., < duer, duer, duo, < de, -ty, formed after such words as beauty, beauty, etc.: see duel and -ty.] 1. Obligatory service; that which ought to be done; that which one is bound by natural, moral, or legal obligation to do or perform.

It doth not stand with the duty which we owe to our heavenly Father, that to the ordinances of our mother the Church we should show ourselves disobedient.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, III. 9.

Take care that your expressions be prudent and safe, consisting with thy other duties.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 366.

In the middle ages fealty to a feudal lord was accounted a duty, and the assumption of personal freedom a crime.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 265.

2. The obligation to do something; the binding or obligatory force of that which is morally right: as, when duty calls, one must obey.

For the parents injure was renewed, and the duties of nature performed or satisfied by the child.

Pullenham, Arte of Eng. Poetrie, p. 158.

I taught my wife her duty, mastered her
What it belov'd her we and say and do, Feel in her heart and with her tongue declare.

Browning, Ring and Book, I. 237.

O hard, when love and duty clash!

Tennyson, Princess, II.

It is asserted that we are so constituted that the notion of duty furnishes in itself a natural motive of action of the highest order, and wholly distinct from all the refinements and modifications of self-interest.

Locky, Europ. Morals, I. 168.

Duty to one's countrymen and fellow-citizens, which is the social instinct guided by reason, is in all healthy communities the one thing sacred and supreme.

W. K. Clifford, Lectures, II. 60.

3. Due obedience; submission; compliant or obedient service.

Every subject's duty is the king's, but every subject's soul is his own.

Shak., Hen. V., IV. 1.

4. A feeling of obligation, or an act manifesting such feeling; an expression of submissive deference or respectful consideration. [Archaism or prov. Eng.]

They both attend

Indebted to their Lady, as becometh.

Spenser, F. Q., II. 1. 23.

There also did the Corporation of Dover and the Earl of Wiltshire do the high duties to him, in like sort.

Keats's J. of Gravel's Eng. (Garnet, I. 27).

I must entreat you to take a promise that you shall have the privilege for a testimony of that duty which I owe to your love.

Donne, Letters, xiv.

He craved so for news of Sylvia, . . . even though it was only that she sent her duty to him.

Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, xix.

5. Any requisite procedure, service, business or office; that which one ought to do; particularly, any stated service or function: as, the duties of one's station in life; to go or be on duty; the regiment did duty in Flanders.

Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. Eccl. xii. 13.

To employ him on the hardest and most imperative duty. Hallam.

6. In mech., the number of foot-pounds of work done per bushel or per hundredweight of fuel consumed: as, the duty of a steam-engine.—74. That which is due; an obligation; compensation; dues.

And right as Judas hadde purses smale
And was a thief, right swiche a thief was he,
His master hadde but half his duties.
Chaucer, Friar's Tale, l. 6034.

They neither regarded to sette him to scholre, nor while he was at scholre to pale his schoolmaster's duties.
J. Udall, tr. of Apophthegms of Erasmus, p. 360.

The man shall give unto the woman a ring, laying the same upon the book, with the accustomed duty to the Priest and Clerk. Rubric in Marriage (1662).

Do thy duty, and have thy duty. Shak., T. of the S., iv. 1.

8. A tax or impost: excise or customs dues; the sum of money levied by a government upon certain articles, specifically on articles imported or exported: as, the stamp duty of Great Britain; the legacy duty; the duties on sugar; ad valorem and specific duties.

To dames discreet, the duties yet unpaid,
His stores of lace and hysen he convey'd.
Crabbe, Works, l. 56.

The word duties is often used as synonymous with taxes, but is more often used as equivalent to customs; the latter being taxes levied upon goods and merchandise which are exported or imported. In this sense, duties are equivalent to imposts, although the latter word is often restrained to duties on goods and merchandise which are imported from abroad. Andrews, Revenue Laws, § 133.

When a child is seized with some undefinable ailment, it is common to say, "It's just some dwalm." Jamieson.

dwang (dwang), n. A strait inserted between the timbers of a floor to stiffen them. [Scotch.]

dwarf (dwārf), n. and a. [Cf. ME. dwarf, dworf, where f represents the changed sound (so in LG. below) of the guttural, which also took a different development in the parallel ME. dworow, dworow (mod. E. as if dwarrow*; cf. arrow, barron, etc.), < deceygh, deceygh (whence also mod. dial. dogan), a dwarf, particularly as an attendant, < AS. deowerg, deowerk, a dwarf (def. 1), = D. deerg, a dwarf, = MLG. deereck, deereck, deerk = Lti. dearf, a dwarf, contr. dorf, an insignificant person or thing, = OHG. deery, MLG. deere, quereck, ereck, G. deery, a dwarf, = Icel. deery = Sw. and Dan. deery, a dwarf. The mythological sense appears esp. in Scand., and may be the orig. sense.] 1. A person of very small size; a human being much below the ordinary stature. True dwarfs (some of the most celebrated of whom have been from 3 to less than 2 feet in height) are usually well formed; but dwarfism is often accompanied by deformity or caused by disproportion of parts. In ancient, medieval, and later times, dwarfs have been in demand as personal attendants upon ladies and noblemen: and the ancient Romans practiced methods of dwarfing persons artificially.

Of that Citee was Ezechus the Dwarf, that climb'd up in to the Sycomour Tree, for tokes our Lord; he came he was so lillie, he myghte not see him for the people.
Wanderell, Travels, p. 22.

Behind her farre away a Dwarf's did lag,
That lase second, in being ever last.
Spenser, F. Q., l. i. 6.

But wish'd to dwell for ever in the grove.

Bryden, Flower and Leaf, I. 135.

And Virtue cannot dwell with slaves, nor reign

O'er those who cower to take a tyrant's yoke.

Bryant, The Ages.

3. To live; be; exist: without reference to place.

There was dwellynge somtyme a ryche man, and it is not longe sithen, and men clep him Gatholouabas; and he was fulle of Cautelles.

Manderlye, Travels, p. 277.

To dwell on or upon. (a) To keep the attention fixed on, regard with attention or interest.

They stand at a distance dwelling on his looks and language, fixed in amazement.

Ruckminster.

The mind must abide and dwell upon things, of be always a stranger to the inside of them.

South.

Do you not, for instance, dwell on the thought of wealth and splendour till you forget these temporal blessings?

J. H. Newman, Parochial Sermons, I. 89.

Then Lancelot lifted his large eyes; they dwell

Deep-tranced on her. Tennyson, Ballad and Ballad.

(b) To continue on; occupy a long time with; speak or write about at great length or with great fullness: as, to dwell on a note in music; to dwell upon a subject.

But I shall not dwell upon speculations so abstracted as this.

Stowe, Spectator, No. 19.

I must not dwell on that defeat of fame.

Tennyson, Guinevere.

To dwell under one's vine and fig-tree, to live in one's own home: enjoy the possession of a home in one's own right. 1 Ki. iv. 25. = Syn. 2. Abide, Sojourn, Continue, etc. See abide.

II. trans. 1. To inhabit.

Who dwell this wild, constrain'd by want, come forth,

To town or village.

Milton, P. R., I. 331.

2. To place as an inhabitant; plant.

The promise of the Father, who shall dwell

His spirit within them. Milton, P. R., xii. 497.

dwell (dwell), v. [< dwell, v.] In printing, the brief continuation of pressure in the taking of an impression on a hand-press or an Adams press, supposed to set or fasten the ink more firmly in the paper.

dwell (dwell), v. [< ME. dwellen, < dwellen, dwell: see dwell, v.] An inhabitant; a resident of some continuance in a place.

And it was known unto all the dwellers at Jerusalem.

Acts i. 18.

Dweller in you dungeon dark.

Burns, Ode on Mrs. Oswald.

Dweller on the threshold, in occultism, an imaginary being or spirit, of frightful aspect and malicious character, supposed to be encountered on the threshold of one's studies in psychic science, as a kind of Cerberus guarding the realm of spirit. Ruler.

dwell (dwell), v. [< ME. dwelling, dwelling, delay, continuance, an abode, verbal n. of dwellen, dwell.] 1. Delay. Chaucer.—2. Continuance; stay; sojourn.

Therefore every man bithinke him wel

How bill while is his dwelling

Hymne to Virgine, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 94.

3. Habitation; residence; abode; lodgment.

Ne no wighte made, by my clothing.

Wete with what folke is my dwelling.

Rom. of the Rose.

Thy dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field.

Dan. ix. 32.

The condition of that fardel, the place of your dwelling, your names?

Shak., W. T., iv. 3.

4. A place of residence or abode; an abiding-place; specifically, a house for residence; a dwelling-house.

Hazor shall be a dwelling for dragons.

Jer. xlix. 33.

There was a great white dwelling on the hill, which we took to be the parsonage. B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 350.

dwell (dwell), v. [< ME. dwelling, dwelling, delay, continuance, an abode, verbal n. of dwellen, dwell.] A place of residence; an abiding-place.

One Message or Dwelling house, called the Vice ardege house.

Record Soc. of Lancashire and Cheshire, I. 13.

dwell (dwell), v. [< ME. dwelling, dwelling, delay, continuance, an abode, verbal n. of dwellen, dwell.] A place of residence; an abiding-place.

Thet . . . has not here a dwelling place for ever.

Wright, Selected Works (ed. Arnold), III. 107.

There, where saint Katoyn was buried, is neither church nor chapel; no other dwelling place.

Manderlye, Travels, p. 302.

The Church of Christ hath been hereby made not "a den of thieves," but in a manner the very dwelling place of foul spirits.

Hooker, L. C. C. Polity, vi. 24.

This wretched Inn, where we were stay to halt,

We call our Dwelling place.

Cooley, Madame Ode, xli. 1.

dwell (dwell). Preterit and past participle of dwell.

dwindle (dwin'dl), v.; pret. and pp. dwindled, ppr. dwindling. [Freq. (for dwindle*) of ME. dwinnen, waste away, dwine; see dwine.] 1. To diminish; become less; shrink; waste or consume away: with by or from before the cause, and to, in, or into before the effect or result: as, the body dwindles by pining or consumption; an estate dwindles from waste; an object dwindles in size as it recedes from view; from its constant exposure, the regiment dwindled to a skeleton.

Wearry sev'n nights, nine times nine,

Shall he dwindle, peak, and pine.

Shak., Macbeth, I. 3.

Dwa natural and constant transfer, the one (estate) had been extended; the other had dwindled to nothing.

Macaulay, Balfour's Const. Hist.

In the common Triton of our ponds, the external lungs or branches dwindle away when the internal lungs have grown to maturity.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 68.

2. To degenerate; sink; fall away in quality.

Religious societies . . . are said to have dwindled into factious clubs.

Swift.

The flattery of his friends began to dwindle into simple approbation.

Goldsmith, Vicar, iii.

= Syn. 1. Diminish, etc. (see decrease); attenuate, become attenuated, decline, fall off, fall away.

dwindle (dwin'dl), v. [< dwindle, v.] Gradual decline or decrease; a wasting away; degeneracy; decline.

However inferior to the heroes who were born in better ages, he might still be great among his contemporaries, with the hope of growing every day greater to the demands of posterity.

Johann, Alton.

dwindlement (dwin'dl-ment), n. [< dwindle + -ment.] A dwindled state or condition; decreased size, strength, etc.

It was with a sensation of dreadful dwindlement that poor Vincent crossed the street again to his lonely abode.

Mrs. Oliphant, Balem Chapel, I.

dwine (dwin), v.; pret. and pp. dwined, ppr. dwining. [E. dial. and Sc., < ME. dwinnen, <

AS. dwinan, pine away, dwindle, = MD. dwinan = LG. dwinan = leol. dwinan, dwinan, dwinan = Sw. dwinan, pine away, languish; cf. Dan. dwinan, whine, whimper. Hence dwindle.] To pine; decline, especially by sickness; fade or waste: usually with away.

Dwellfull echo dwinde a-while bothe dayes & nights.

William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), I. 678.

My lone cuore wexinge be,

So that y nonere dwynne.

Hymne to Virgine, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 27.

He just dwinde away, and we hadn't taken but one while before our captain died, and first mate took th' command.

Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, I.

dwt. A contraction of pennyweight, d. standing for Latin denarius, a penny, and wt. for weight. dyad (di'ad), n. and a. [< LL. dyas (dyad-), < Gr. dyas (dyad-), the number two, < dvo = E. two, q. v.] I. n. 1. Two units treated as one; a pair; a couple.

A point answers to a monad, and a line to a dyad, and a superficies to a triad.

Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 37d.

2. In chem., an elementary substance each of whose atoms, in combining with other atoms or molecules, is equivalent in saturating power to two atoms of hydrogen. For example, oxygen is a dyad as seen in the compound H₂O (water), whereas atom of oxygen combines with and saturates two atoms of hydrogen.

3. In morphology, a secondary unit of organization, resulting from individuation or integration of an aggregate of monads. See monad.—

4. In math., an expression signifying the operation of multiplying internally by one vector and then by another.—Pythagorean dyad, the number two considered as an essence or constituent of being.

II. a. Same as dyadic.

dyad-deme (di'ad-dēm), n. A colony or aggregate of undifferentiated dyads. See monad-deme.

A secondary unit or dyad, this rising through dyad-demes into a triad.

Knapp, Brit., XVI. 848.

dyadic (di'ad-ik), a. and n. [< dyad + -ic.]

I. a. 1. Pertaining or relating to the number two, or to a dyad; consisting of two parts or elements; as, a dyadic metal.—2. In Gr. pros.: (a) Comprising two different rhythmic or metrical; as, a dyadic epiphora. (b) Consisting of pericope, or groups of systems each of which contains two unlike systems; as, a dyadic poem.—Dyadic arithmetic. Same as binary arithmetic (which see, under binary).—Dyadic disyntheme, any combination of dyads, with or without repetition, in which each element occurs twice and no element occurs only once.

Also dyad, duade.

II. n. 1. In math., a sum of dyads. See dyad.—2. The science of reckoning with a system of numerals in which the ratio of values of successive places is two. Complete dyadic. See complete.—Conjugate dyadics. See conjugate.—Cyclic dyadic, a dyadic which may be expressed to any desired degree of approximation as a root of a unity or universal identifier. Linear dyadic, a dyadic reducible to a dyad. Planar dyadic, a dyadic which can be reduced to the sum of two dyads. Shearing dyadic, a dyadic expressing a simple or complex shear. Uniplanar dyadic, a planar dyadic in which the plane of the antecedents coincides with that of the consequents.

Dyak (di'ak), n. One of a native race inhabiting Borneo, the largest island of the Malay archipelago. The Dyaks are numerically the leading people of the island, and are usually believed to be its aborigines. Also Dyak, Dyakker.

dyakis-dodecahedron (di'g-kis-dō'dek-a-hē'dron), n. [< Gr. dyakis, twelve, + dodekaidron, a dodecahedron; see dodecahedron.] Same as diploid.

The dyakis-dodecahedron, bounded by twenty four triangles with two sides equal, has twelve short, twelve long, and twenty four intermediate edges.

Knapp, Brit., XVI. 255.

dyarchy (di'ar-ki), n.; pl. dyarchies (-kiz). [< Gr. dyarchia, dyarchy, < dvo, two, + archon, rule, govern.] A government by two; a diarchy. Also duarchy.

The name Dyarchy, given by Dr. Mommson to the constitution of Augustus, is not yet sufficiently justified.

The Academy, Feb. 25, 1890, p. 122.

Dyas (di'as), n. [NL. use of LL. dyas, the number two; see dyad.] In geol., a name sometimes applied to the Permian system, from its being divided into two principal groups. Compare Trias. See Permian.

Dyassic (di-as-ik), a. Pertaining or belonging to the Dyas or Permian.

dyaster (di-as'ter), n. [NL., < Gr. dyas, = E. two, + astēr = E. star.] The double-star figure occurring in or resulting from eurycinesis. Also spelled diaster.

dye¹ (dī), v. t.; pret. and pp. dyed, ppr. dyeing. [Formerly also die; < ME. dye, dien, deyen, < AS. deugan, deugan, dye, color, < deag, deah, a dye, color, < deigan*, a strong verb found only once, in pret. deog, dye, tinge, prob. (like tinge, < L. tingere), orig. wet, moisten, and allied to AS. deaur, E. dew, and so to E. dag, dew, and deg, moisten, sprinkle: see deut.] 1. To fix a color or colors in the substance of by immersion in a properly prepared bath; impregnate with coloring matter held in solution. The matters used for dyeing are obtained from vegetables, animals, and minerals; and the subjects to which they are applied are porous materials in general, but especially wool, cotton, silk, linen, hair, skins, feathers, ivory, wood, and marble. The great diversity of tint obtained in dyeing is the result of the combination of two or more simple coloring substances with one another or with certain chemical reagents. To render the colors permanent, the subsequent application of a mordant, or the precipitation of the coloring matter by the direct use of a mordant, is usually required, but when aniline and some other artificial dyes are used, no mordant is necessary. The superficial application of pigments to tissues by means of adhesive vehicles such as oil and albumen, as in painting or in some kinds of calico-printing, does not constitute dyeing, because the coloring bodies so applied do not penetrate the fiber, and are not intimately incorporated with it. 2. To overspread with color, as by effusion; tinge or stain in general.

I cannot rest
Until the white rose that I went to dyed
Even in the lukewarm blood of Honey's heart.
Shak., 3 Hon. VI., l. 2.

Mony o' Murry's men lay gaspin,
An' dyit th' grund w' thole bleid.
Battle of Forbie (Child's Ballads, VII. 213).

Their [maiden's] cheeks were dyed with vermilion.
Purshas, Pilgrimage, p. 807.

Over the front door trailed a luxuriant woodbine, now dyed by the frosts into a dark claret.
S. Judd, Margaret, II. 8.

To dye in grain. See grain. To dye scarlet, to drink deep; drink till the face becomes scarlet.

dye² (dī), n. [< ME. "dye," "dege" (not found), < AS. dedg, deah, a dye, color; see the verb, which is orig. from the noun.] 1. Coloring matter in solution; a coloring liquor.

A kind of shell-fish, having in the midst of his jaws a certain white vein, which containeth that precious liquor:
a dye of sovereign estimation. Sauvage, Travaux, p. 108.

2. Color; hue; tint; tinge.

And creeping shrubs of thousand dyes
Waved in the west wind's summer sighs.

dye⁴, n. An obsolete spelling of *die*².

You shall no more deal with the hollow dye
Or the frail card. B. Jonson, Alchemist, II. 1.

dye-bath (dī'bath), n. A bath prepared for use in dyeing; a solution of coloring matter in which substances to be colored are immersed.

Gallic acid, like acetic acid, is used for preparing dye.
C. P. Davis, Leather, p. 108.

dye-beck (dī'bek), n. Same as dye-bath.

The dye-beck consists of alizarin and tannin.
Ure, Dict., IV. 915.

dye-house¹ (dī'hous), n. A building in which dyeing is carried on.

dye-house² (dī'hous), n. [A dial. var. of dye-house.] A milk-house or dairy. Grasse. [Prov. Eng.]

dyeing (dī'ing), n. [Verbal n. of *dye*¹, v.] The operation or practice of fixing colors in solution in textile and other porous substances.

dye-pot (dī'pot), n. A dye-vat.

There were clothes there which were to receive different colors. All these Jews threw into one dye-pot, . . . and taking them out, each [piece] was dyed as the dyer wished.
Stowe, Origin of the Books of the Bible, p. 222.

dyer (dī'er), n. [*< ME. dyere, dore, deyer, < dyen, etc., dye; see dye*¹, v.] One whose occupation is to dye cloth, skins, feathers, etc.

Almost . . . my nature is subdued
To what it works in, like the dyer's hand.
Shak., Sonnets, cxi.

Dyers' spirit, the tetrachlorid, known to commerce as oxyanhydride of tin (SnCl₄ + 2H₂O). It is a valuable mordant.

dyer's-broom (dī'erz-brōm), n. The plant Genista tinctoria, used to make a green dye. Also called dyeweed.

dyer's-greenweed (dī'erz-grōn'wēd), n. Same as dyer's-broom.

dyer's-moss (dī'erz-mōs), n. The lichen Rocella tinctoria. Same as archil, 2.

dyer's-weed (dī'erz-wēd), n. The wood-weld, or yellow-weed, Reseda luteola, affording a yellow dye, and cultivated in Europe on that account.

dyester (dī'stēr), n. [*< dye*¹ + -ster.] A dye.

dyestone (dī'stōn), n. A red ferruginous limestone occurring in Tennessee, used occasionally in the place of a dye, although insoluble and not properly a dye.—Dyestones ore, an iron ore of great economical importance in the United States. Also called fosail, dyestone fossil, flashed, and Clinton ore. See Clinton ore, under ore.

dyestuff (dī'stuf), n. In com., any dyewood, lichen, powder, or dye-cake used in dyeing and staining. The most important dyestuffs are cochineal, madder, indigo, logwood, fustic, quercitron-bark, and the various preparations of aniline. Also called dyecore.

dye-trial (dī'tri'al), n. An experiment with coloring matters to determine their value as dyes. Such experiments are usually performed by dyeing small pieces of yarn or fabric, of equal size, in beakers, one of which contains the coloring matter in question, the other a standard of the same colorant.

Never less than two dye-trials should be carried out at once, viz., one with the new coloring matter, the other with a coloring matter of known value, which is taken as the "type." Beudant, Coal-tar Colours (trans.), p. 67.

dye-vat (dī'vat), n. A bath containing dyes, and fitted with an apparatus for immersing the fabrics to be colored.

dyeware (dī'wār), n. Same as dyestuff.

The reaction which ensues is not produced by any other dye ware.
Ure, Dict., IV. 354.

dyewood (dī'wēd), n. Same as dyer's-broom.

dyewood (dī'wūd), n. Any wood from which dye is extracted.

dye-works (dī'wērks), n. sing. or pl. An establishment in which dyeing is carried on.

dygogram (dī'gō-grām), n. [< Gr. dygma], power, + gō (via), angle, + gramma, anything written.] A diagram containing a curve generated by the motion of a line drawn from a fixed origin, and representing in direction and magnitude the horizontal component of the force of magnetism on a ship's compass-needle while the ship makes a complete circuit. The course of the ship is marked on the curve. There are two kinds of dygogram, according as it is supposed to be fixed in space during the rotation of the ship or fixed on the ship.

dying (dī'ing), n. [Verbal n. of *die*¹, v.] The act of expiring; loss of life; death.

Always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body.
2 Cor., IV. 10.

dying (dī'ing), p. a. [< ME. dyonge, dyug, with older term drend, diand, etc.; ppr. of *die*¹, v. In some uses, as dying hour, dying bed, etc. (dts. 4, 5), the word is the verbal noun used attributively.] 1. Physically decaying; failing from life; approaching death or dissolution; moribund: as, a dying man; a dying tree.

The noise of battle hurried in the air,
. . . and dying men died groan. Shak., J. C., II. 2.

2. Mortal; destined to death; perishable: as, dying bodies.

I preached as never sure to preach again,
And as a dying man to dying men.
Baxter, Love breathing Thanks and Prayers.

3. Drawing to a close; fading away; failing; languishing: as, the dying year; a dying light.

That strain again;—it had a dying fall.
Shak., T. N., I. 1.

Where the dying night-lamp flickers.
Tennyson, Locksley Hall.

4. Given, uttered, or manifested just before death: as, dying words; a dying request; dying love.

I do prophesy the election lights
On Fortinbras, he has my dying voice.
Shak., Hamlet, v. 2.

Sir, let me speak next,
And let my dying words be better with you
Than my dull living actions.
Beau and Fl., Philaster, v. 3.

5. Pertaining to or associated with death: as, a dying hour; a dying bed.

He served his country as knight of the shire to his dying day.
Steele, Spectator, No. 109.

Dying declaration. See declaration.

dyingly (dī'ing-lī), adv. In a dying or languishing manner.

dyingness (dī'ing-ness), n. The state of dying; hence, a state simulating the approach of death, real or affected; affected languor or faintness; languishment.

Tenderness becomes a true test, a sign of dyingness; you see that picture, Noble—a sympathetic in the eyes.
Congress, Way of the World, III. 3.

dyke, n. and v. A less proper spelling of dike.
dykchopper (dik'hop'ēr), n. The wheatear, Saxicola autumnalis. Newman. [Local Eng. (Stirling).]

dynactinometer (di-nak-ti-nom'e-ter), n. [< Gr. dynamis], power, + actis (axis), a ray, + metron, a measure.] An instrument for measuring the intensity of actinic power, or for comparing the quickness of lenses.

dynagraph (dī'nə-grāf), n. [Short for dynamograph, q. v.] A machine for reporting the condition of a railroad-track, the speed of a train, and the power and consumption of coal and water used in traversing a given distance. The most important machine of this class was built by Professor Dudley, and is employed in examining road-beds in all parts of the United States. It consists of a paper ribbon arranged to pass under a series of recording pens, and moved by means of gearing from one of the axles of the car in which it is placed. The mechanical recording appliances give the tension on the draw-bar, showing the resistance of the car, its speed, the distance traveled absolutely, and in a given number of seconds, minutes, and hours. The oscillations of the car, also the level of the rails, the alignment, the condition of the joints of the rails, and the elevations of the rails at curves, are all mechanically traced on the paper band. Besides this, by simple electrical connections, the amount of water and coal consumed in the engine, the pressure of the steam, the mile-posts, stations, etc., are recorded from the car or from the engine, and all these records appear side by side upon the paper. See seismograph.

dynam (dī'nām), n. [< Gr. dynamis, power, might, strength, faculty, capacity, force, etc., < dynasthai, to be able, capable, strong enough (to do), pass for, signify, perhaps allied to L. dux, hard: see dure, a.] 1. A unit of work, equal to a weight of one pound raised through one foot; a foot-pound.—2. A force, or a force and a couple, the resultant of all the forces acting together on a body. Also spelled dyname.

Dynamene (di-nam'e-nē), n. [NL., < Gr. dynamis, fem. of dynasthai, ppr. of dynasthai, to be able (> dynamis, power): see dynam.] 1. A genus of brachyurous decapod crustaceans, of the family Dromiidae.—2. A genus of calyptoblastic hydroids, of the family Sertulariidae. D. pumila is an example.—3. A genus of spur-heeled cuckoos: same as Eudynamys. Stephens. [Not in use.]—4. A genus of isopods, of the family Spharomidae.—5. A genus of lepidopterous insects. Hübner, 1816.

dynameter (di-nam'e-ter), n. [A contr. of dynamometer, which is differently applied: see dynamometer.] An instrument for determining the magnifying power of telescopes. It consists of a small tube with a transparent plate, exactly divided, which is fixed to the tube of a telescope, in order to measure the diameter of the distinct image of the object-glass.

dynametric, dynametrical (di-na-met'rik, -rikal), a. [< dynameter + -ic, -ical.] Pertaining to a dynameter.

dynamic (di-nam'ik), a. and n. [< Gr. dynamis, powerful, efficacious, < dynasthai, power: see dynam.] 1. a. 1. Pertaining to mechanical forces not in equilibrium: opposed to static.—2. Pertaining to mechanical forces, whether in equilibrium or not; involving the consideration of forces. By extension—3. causal; effective; motive; involving motion or change: often used vaguely.

The direct action of nature as a dynamic agent is powerful on the language of savages, but gradually becomes insensible as civilization advances.

W. K. Sullivan, Int. to O'Curry's Anc. Irish, p. viii.

Action is dynamic existence.

G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, II. 482.

They [Calvinists] teach a spiritual, real, or dynamic and effective presence of Christ in the Eucharist for believers only, while unworthy communicants receive no more than the consecrated elements to their own judgment.

Schaf, Christ and Christianity, p. 166.

4. In the Kantian philos., relating to the reason of existence of an object of experience.—Dynamic category, in the Kantian philos., a category which is the concept of dynamic relation.—Dynamic electricity, current electricity. See electricity.—Dynamic equivalent of heat. See equivalent.—Dynamic geology, that branch of the science of geology which has as its object the study of the nature and mode of action of the agencies by which geological changes are and have been effected. See geology.—Dynamic head. See head.—Dynamic murmurs, cardiac murmurs not caused by valvular incompetence or stenosis, but by an unusual configuration of the internal surface of the heart, as where a chorda tendinea is so placed as to give rise to a murmur.—Dynamic relations, causal relations; especially, the relations between substance and accident, between cause and effect, and between interacting subjects.—Dynamic synthesis, in the Kantian philos., a synthesis of heterogeneous elements necessarily belonging together.

When the pure concepts of the understanding are applied to every possible experience, their synthesis is either mathematical or dynamic; for it is directed partly to the intuition only, partly to the existence of the phenomenon.

Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, II. by Max Müller.

Dynamic theory, a theory by which Kant endeavored to explain the nature of matter or the mode of its formation. According to this theory, all matter was originated by two antagonistic and mutually counteracting principles called attraction and repulsion, all the products of which are referred to motion.—Dynamic theory of nature. (a) A theory which seeks to explain nature from forces, especially from forces of expansion and contraction (as the Stoics did), opposed to a mechanical theory which starts with matter only. (b) The doctrine that nature dynamism (di-'na-miz-m), n. [Gr. dynamis, power (see dynam), + -ism.] 1. The doctrine that besides matter some other material principle—a force in some sense—is required to explain the phenomena of nature. The term is applied—(a) to the doctrines of some of the Ionic philosophers, who held to some such principles as love and hate to explain the origin of motion; (b) to the doctrine adopted by Leibnitz that substance consists in the capacity for action; (c) to the doctrine of Kant that mechanical energy is substance; and (d) to the widely current doctrine that the universe contains nothing not explicable by means of the doctrine of energy.

2. The mode of being of mechanical force or energy.

Who does not see the contradiction of requiring a substance for that which by its definition is not substantial at all, but pure dynamism?

G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, I. II. § 2.

Dynamism would be more appropriate than Materialism as a designation of the modern scientific movement, the idea of inertia having given place to that of an equilibrium of forces.

J. M. Rugg, Mind, XII. 557.

dynamist (di-'na-mist), n. [As dynamism + -ist.] A believer in dynamism.

Then I admit, with the pure dynamist that the material universe, or successive material universes, as manifested from matter and motion, are concatenated with time, are born, run their course, and fade away, as do the clouds at sea.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII. 803.

dynamistic (di-'na-mis-'tik), a. Pertaining to the doctrine of force.

It is usual (and convenient) to speak of two kinds of dynamism—the dynamistic and the materialistic.

Eng. Brit., XVI. 119.

dynamite (di-'na-mit), n. [Gr. dynamis, power (see dynam), + -ite.] An explosive of great power, consisting of a mixture of nitroglycerin with some absorbent such as sawdust, or a certain silicious earth from Oberlohe in Hanover. The object of the mixture is to diminish the sensitiveness of nitroglycerin to slight shock and so to facilitate its carriage without impairing its explosive quality. The disruptive force of dynamite is estimated at about eight times that of gunpowder. Dynamite may be ignited with a match, and will burn quickly with a bright flame without any explosion. Large quantities have been known to fall 30 feet on a hard surface without explosion. It explodes with certainty when ignited by a cap or fuse containing fulminating mercury.

dynamited (di-'na-mit-id), v. t. pret. and pp. dynamited, ppr. dynamiting. [Cf. dynamite, n.] 1. To mine or charge with dynamite in order to prevent the approach of an enemy, or for destructive purposes.

The military authorities of Prussia had some 1,400 men to go forth that some of the buildings and roads were dynamited and thus destroyed. The boats in entering the town which was a matter of fact was not dynamited at all.

4th March, N. York, p. 501.

2. To blow up or destroy by or as if by dynamite.

It appears from the letters that the American Republic has been dynamited, and up to this time a small public establishment.

His (Prince Alexander's) Bohemian people are not at all inclined to dynamite him, who is more than can be said for the Croat.

Times (London), April 1, 1886.

dynamite-gun (di-'na-mit-gun), n. A gun constructed for propelling dynamite, nitroglycerin, or other high explosives, by means of steam or compressed air under high tension.

dynamiter (di-'na-mi-ter), n. [Cf. dynamite + -er.] One who uses, or is in favor of using, dynamite and similar explosives for unlawful purposes; specifically a political agitator who resorts to or advocates the use of dynamite and the indiscriminate destruction of life and property for the purpose of coercing a government or a party by terror.

Surely no plea of justification is made by the dynamiter from the criminal character of his infernal deeds.

The recent explosions on the London and North Western Railway were the work of dynamite.

The American, VII. 91.

Dynamiters subventioned by Christian fanatics were to appear in Mexico.

Atlantic Monthly, XVIII. 41.

dynamitism (di-'na-mit-'izm), n. [Cf. dynamite + -ism.] Having to do with dynamite; violently explosive or destructive.

I see certain dynamitist criticisms in the Boston Herald, and his attitude towards institutions for murder is not unlike that of the dynamitist towards institutions.

British and Foreign Review, XXIV. 25.

dynamitically (di-'na-mit-'i-kal-i), adv. By means, or as by means, of dynamite; with explosive violence.

The Irish attempts at New York, Paris, and elsewhere dynamitically to blow up England on behalf of Ireland.

The Congregationalist, Feb. 17, 1886.

dynamitism (di-'na-mit-'izm), n. [Cf. dynamite + -ism.] Same as dynamiter.

If Ireland is to be turned into a Crown Colony, she must be put under martial law, and even that will be no defence against the attacks of dynamitism by which we may be struck at home.

dynamization (di-'na-mi-'zā-shon), n. [Cf. dynamis + -ation.] 1. Dynamic development; increase of power in anything; dynamogeny; as, dynamization of nerve-force.—2. In homeopathy, the extreme trituration of medicines with a view to increase their efficiency or strength.

dynamize (di-'na-miz), v. t. pret. and pp. dynamized, ppr. dynamizing. [Cf. dynamis, power (see dynam), + -ize.] In homeopathy, to increase the efficiency or strength of (medicines) by extreme trituration.

dynamo (di-'na-mō), n. An abbreviation of dynamo-electric machine. See electric.

The machines were driven by a Cummer engine of about a hundred horse-power, which furnished power for other dynamos.

Science, III. 17.

Characteristic of a dynamo. See characteristic. Compound dynamo, a dynamo in which the field magnets are excited by both series and shunt windings.—Series dynamo, a dynamo in which the whole current generated in the armature is passed through the coil of the field magnets.—Shunt dynamo, a dynamo in which only a part of the entire current generated by the rotating armature is applied to excite the field magnets.

dynamo-electric, dynamo-electrical (di-'na-mō-'ē-'lek-'trik, -'tri-'kal), a. [Cf. dynamis, power (see dynam), + electric, electrical.] Producing force by means of electricity; as, a dynamo-electric machine; also, produced by electric force. Dynamo-electric machine. See electric.

dynamogenesis (di-'na-mō-'jō-'nē-sis), n. Same as dynamogeny.

dynamogenic (di-'na-mō-'jō-'nē-'ik), a. [Cf. dynamogeny + -ic.] Pertaining to dynamogeny.

The influence thus manifested is dynamogenic.

Dr. Brown Sequard.

dynamogeny (di-'na-mō-'jō-'nē), n. [Cf. dynamis, power (see dynam), + -geny, -genesis, producing; see -geny.] In psychic science, production of increased nervous activity; dynamization of nerve-force. Also dynamogenesis.

dynamograph (di-'na-mō-'g'raf), n. [Cf. dynamis, power (see dynam), + graphos, write.] An instrument combining a sensitive spring and a register to indicate the muscular power exerted by the hand of a person compressing it.

dynamometer (di-'na-mō-'mē-'tēr), n. [Contr. dynameter, q. v.; Cf. dynamis, power (see dynam), + metron, a measure.] An apparatus for measuring the amount of force expended by men, animals, or motors in moving a load, operating machines, towing vessels, etc., a power measurer. Dynamometers use the resistance of springs, weights, and friction as a test, each comparison being made with a known weight or force that will overcome the resistance of the spring, raise the weight or balance the friction. One of the simplest forms is a steel yard in which the force to be measured is applied to the shorter arm while a weight is balanced on the longer graduated arm. The most common form of spring dynamometer consists of an elliptical spring that may be compressed or pulled apart in the direction of its longer axis with an index and scale, and sometimes a recording pen to indicate the amount of force exerted. In the apparatus depending on friction a brake is applied to the face of a pulley, and the force is measured by the resistance of the brake to the motion of the pulley. In other forms fast and loose pulleys are placed side by side and connected by weighted levers, a certain amount of force being required to lift the lever and communicate motion to both pulleys. In still other forms coiled springs are used to test a direct strain, as in moving a load or in towing. There are other forms used to test the recoil of guns and the explosive force of gunpowder. In the latter the dynamometer consists of two pairs of bevel wheels are interposed between the resolving and the transmitting pulleys, one pair in line with the pulleys, the other pair at right angles to them and in line with a balance scale beam. The force and resistance transmitted through the gears tend to turn the scale beam as at the line of the pulley shafts, and this must be resisted by a weight upon the scale beam, which is the measure of the force transmitted. The dynamometer is not a direct indicator of power exerted or of work performed, but when the velocity with which resistance is overcome or force transmitted has been determined by other means, this velocity and the measure of the force obtained by the dynamometer, are the data for computing the power or work. See balance dynamometer, crusher gauge, piezometer, and pressure-gauge.—Dynamometer coupling, a device inserted in a shaft by means of which the power transmitted may be measured.

dynamometry (di-'na-mō-'mē-'tri), n. [Cf. dynamometer + -y.] The art or art of using the dynamometer.

of longicorn beetles, of the family Cerambycidae. There is but one species, D. audax, of the East Indies.

dynast (di-nast), n. [= F. dynaste = Pg. dynasta = Sp. It. dinasta, < L. dynastes (ML also dynasta*), < Gr. δυνάστης, a lord, master, ruler, < δυνατός, be able, strong; see dynam.] A ruling prince; a permanent or hereditary ruler.

Philosophers, dynasts, monarchs, all were involved and overshadowed in this mist. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 599.

The ancient family of Des Ewes, dynasts or lords of the dition of Kewell. A. Wood, Athens Oxon.

This Thracian dynast is mentioned as an ally of the Athenians against Philip in an inscription found some years ago in the Acropolis at Athens.

B. V. Head, Historia Numorum, p. 241.

dynasta (di-nas'tā), n. [*ML. dynasta, L. dynastes, < Gr. δυνάστης; see dynast.] Same as dynast.

Wherefore did his mother, the virgin Mary, give such praise to God in her prophetic song, that he had now by the coming of Christ cut down dynasts, or proud monarchs? Milton, Tenure of Kings and Magistrates.

Dynastes (di-nas'tēs), n. [NL., < Gr. δυνάστης, a ruler; see dynast.] A genus of lamellicorn beetles, of the family Scurabidae or typical of a family Dynastidae. It is restricted to forms having the external maxillary lobe with 3 or 4 small median teeth, no lateral prothoracic projections, and the last tarsal joint arcuate and clubbed. The type is D. hercules, the Hercules beetle, the largest known true insect, having a length of about 6 inches, of which the curved prothoracic horn is nearly one half.

dynastic (di-nas'tik), a. [= F. dynastique = Sp. It. dinastico; cf. D. G. dynastisch = Dan. Sw. dynastisk, < Gr. δυναστικός, < δυνάστης, a ruler; see dynast.] Relating or pertaining to a dynasty or line of kings.

In Holland dynastic interests were betraying the welfare of the republic. Janeway, Hist. Const., II. 366.

The civil wars of the Romans had been a barren period in English literature, because they had been merely dynastic squabbles, in which no great principles were involved which could shake all minds with controversy and heat them to intense conviction.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 150.

The dynastic traditions of Europe are rooted and grounded in the distant past.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 15.

dynasticism (di-nas'ti-sizm), n. [< dynastic + -ism.] Kingship or imperial power handed down from father to son; government by successive members of the same line or family.

In the Old World dynasticism is plainly in a state of decadence. Goldwin Smith, Pop. Sci. Mo., XX. 628.

Dynastidae (di-nas'ti-de), n. pl. [NL., < Dynastes + -idae.] A family of lamellicorn beetles, taking name from the genus Dynastes, and containing a few forms remarkable for their great size and strength. They are chiefly tropical, and burrow in the ground. The Hercules beetle, elephant beetle, and atlas beetle are examples. The group is usually placed in Scurabidae.

Dynastidan (di-nas'ti-dan), n. [< Dynastidae + -an.] One of the Dynastidae.

dynasty (di-nas'ti), n.; pl. dynasties (-tiz). [= D. G. dynastie = Dan. Sw. dynasti, < F. dynastie = Sp. It. dinastia = Pg. dynastia = It. dinastia, < ML. dynastia, dynastia, < Gr. δυναστρία, lordship, rule, < δυνάστης, a lord, master, ruler; see dynast.] 1. A government; a sovereignty. 2. A race or succession of sovereigns of the same line or family governing a particular country; as, the successive dynasties of Egypt or of France.

At some time or other, to be sure, all the beginners of dynasties were chosen by those who called them to govern. Burke, Rev. in France.

It is to Manetho that we are indebted for that classification called by the Greeks Dynasties, a word applied generally to those sets of kings which belonged to one family, or who were derived from one original stock. These Dynasties were named as well as numbered, and their names were derived from the town, or region, whence the founder came or where he lived.

H. S. Gabel, Ancient Egypt, p. 49.

dyne (din), n. [Abbr. of dynam, < Gr. δυνάμις, power; see dynam.] In physics, the unit of force in the centimeter-gram-second system, being that force which, acting on a gram for one second, generates a velocity of a centimeter per second; the product of a gram into a centimeter, divided by the square of a mean solar second. The force of a dyne is about equivalent to the weight of a milligram. It requires a force of about 445,000 dynes to support one pound of matter on the earth's surface in latitude 45°.

The dyne is about 1.02 times the weight of a milligramme at any part of the earth's surface; and the megadyne is about 1.02 times the weight of a kilogramme.

J. D. Everett, Units and Phys. Const., p. 167.

dyocetriacontahedron, dyoketriacontahedron (di'ō-kō-sē, di'ō-kē-tri-a-kōn-tā-hō'dron), n.

[< Gr. δίο καὶ τριάκοντα, thirty-two (δίο = E. two; καί, and; τριάκοντα = L. triginta = E. thirty), + ἔδρα, seat, base.] In geom., a solid having thirty-two faces.

dyophysitic (di'ō-fī-zit'ik), a. [< Gr. δίο, = E. two, + φύσις, nature, + -itis + -ic. Cf. diphy-sile.] Having two natures.

They agree in the attempt to substitute a Christ-personality with one consciousness and one will for a dyophysitic Christ with a double consciousness and a double will.

Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 64.

dyotheism (di'ō-thō-izm), n. [< Gr. δίο, = E. two, + θεός, a god, + -ism. Cf. ditheism, the preferable form.] The doctrine that there are two Gods, or a system which recognizes such a doctrine; dualism.

It [Arianism] starts with a zeal for the unity and the unchangeableness of God; and yet ends in dyotheism, the doctrine of an uncreated God and a created God.

Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 58.

dyothelism (di'ō-thē-lizm), n. [Also diothelism; < Gr. δίο, = E. two, + θελήω, will, + -ism.] The doctrine that Christ had two wills.

dyothelite (di'ō-thē-lit), n. and a. [As dyotheism + -ite.] 1. n. A believer in dyothelism. 2. a. Pertaining to dyothelism.

The reply of the Western Church was promptly given in the unambiguously dyothelite decrees of the Lateran synod held by Martin I. in 649. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 758.

dys- [L. dys-, < Gr. δύνω, an inseparable prefix, opposed to eu- (see eu-), much like E. mis- or un-, always with notion of 'hard, bad, unlucky,' etc., destroying the good sense of a word or increasing its bad sense; = Skt. dū- = Zend dush- = Ir. do- = Goth. tus-, tuz- = OHG. zur- = Teut. tor-, hard, difficult.] An inseparable prefix in words of Greek origin, signifying 'hard, difficult, bad, ill,' and implying some difficulty, imperfection, inability, or privation in the act, process, or thing denoted by the word of which it forms a part.

dysæsthesia (dis-es'tē-si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. δυσαισθησία, insensibility, < δυσαισθητός, insensible, < δύω, hard, + αἰσθητός, verbal adj. of αἰσθάνομαι, perceive, feel.] In pathol., impaired, diminished, or difficult sensation; dullness of feeling; numbness; insensibility in some degree. Also spelled dysæsthesia.

dysæsthetic (dis-es'tē'tik), a. [< dysæsthesia, after æsthetic.] Affected by, exhibiting, or relating to dysæsthesia. Also spelled dysæsthetic.

dysanalyte (dis-an'lyt), n. [< Gr. δυσανάλυτος, hard to undo, < δύω, hard, + ανάλυσις, dissolution; see analytic.] A mineral related to pyrochlore, occurring in small black cubic crystals in limestone at Vogtsburg in the Kaiserstuhl, a mountainous district of Baden.

dysarthria (dis-ar'thri-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. δυσάρθρῳ, a joint.] In pathol., inability to articulate distinctly; dyslalia.

dysarthric (dis-ar'thrik), a. [< dysarthria + -ic.] Of or pertaining to dysarthria.

Dysaster (dis-as'tēr), n. [NL., < Gr. δύνω, bad, + αστήρ = E. star.] A genus of fossil petalostichous sea-urchins, of the family Cassidulidae or Collyritidae, or giving name to a family Dysasteridae.

Dysasteridae (dis-as'tēr-i-de), n. pl. [NL., < Dysaster + -idae.] A family of irregular or exo-evell sea-urchins, typified by the genus Dysaster, with ovoid or cordate shell, showing bivalve and trivium converging to separate apices, non-petaloid ambulacra, and eccentric mouth.

dyschezia (dis-hē'zi-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. δύνω, hard, + ἔξω, defecate.] In pathol., difficulty and pain in defecation.

dyschroma, dyschroa (dis-kroi'ā, dis-kro'ā), n. [NL., < Gr. δύνω, bad, + χρῶμα, Attic also χρῶς, color.] In pathol., discoloration of the skin from disease.

dyschromatopsia (dis-kro-mā-top'si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. δύνω, bad, + χρῶμα (-t), color, + ὄψις, view, sight.] In pathol., feeble or perverted color-sense. Also dyschromatopsy, dischromatopsia.

dysclastite (di-'klā sit), n. [< Gr. δύνω, hard, + κλάω, a breaking (< κλάω, break), + -ite.] In mineral., a mineral, usually fibrous, of a white or yellowish color and somewhat pearly luster, consisting chiefly of hydrous silicate of lime. Also called okente.

dyscephid (dis-kē'fid), n. A head-like amphibian of the family Dyscephidae.

Dyscephidae (dis-kē'fī-de), n. pl. [NL., < Dyscephus + -idae.] A family of firmisternal saurian anurous amphibians, typified by the genus Dyscephus, with teeth in the upper jaw, dilated sacral diapophyses, precoracoids resting upon coracoids, a cartilaginous omosternum, and a very large anchor-shaped cartilaginous sternum. There are several genera, chiefly Madagascari. Some of these frogs are remarkable for the beauty of their coloration.

Dyscophus (dis-kō'fus), n. [NL., < Gr. δύνω, stone-deaf, < δύνω, hard, + κωφός, deaf.] 1. A genus of tailless amphibians, typical of the family Dyscophidae. 2. In entom.; (a) A genus of the orthopterous family Scaphiidae, having the front deflexed and the male elytra rudimentary, typified by D. saltator of Brazil. Saussure, 1874. (b) A genus of South American Lepidoptera. Burmeister, 1879.

dyscrase (dis'krās), n. [Formerly also dyscrase; < NL. dyscrasia; see dyscrasia.] Same as dyscrasia.

dyscrasia (dis-krā'si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. δυσκρασία, bad temperament, < δυσκρατός, of bad temperament, < δύνω, bad, + κράσις, verbal adj. of κρᾶνναι, mix (> κρᾶσις, mixture); see crater, crasis.] In pathol., a generally faulty condition of the body; morbid diathesis; distemper. Also dyscrase, dyscrasy, and formerly dyscrase, dyscrasy.

dyscrasic (dis-krās'ik), a. [< dyscrasia + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of dyscrasia; characterized by dyscrasia: as, dyscrasic degeneration.

It should not be forgotten that the death-rate was greater among dyscrasic children. N. Y. Med. Jour., XL. 645.

dyscrasite (dis-krā'sit), n. [< Gr. δύνω, bad, + κράσις, a mixture (see dyscrasia), + -ite.] A mineral of a silver-white color and metallic luster, occurring in crystals, and also massive and granular. It consists of antimony and silver. Also written dyscrase, dyscrasite, and also called antimonial silver (which see, under silver).

dyscrasy (dis-krā'si), n.; pl. dyscrasies (-siz). [Formerly also dyscrasie; < F. dyscrasie; < NL. dyscrasie; see dyscrasia.] Same as dyscrasia.

It is a cause of dyscrasies and distempers, making our bodies healthless. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 256.

A general malaise or dyscrasy, of an undefined character, but indicated by a loss of appetite and of strength, by diarrhoea, nervous prostration, or by a general impairment of health. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII. 6.

Dysdera (dis-'dē-rā), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1804), < Gr. δυσδέρω, hard to fight with, < δύνω, hard, + δέρω, fight.] The typical genus of spiders of the family Dysderidae.

Dysderidae (dis-der'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dysdera + -idae.] A family of tubularian spiders, typified by the genus Dysdera. They are especially distinguished by having two pairs of stigmata, one just behind the other, and distributed on each side of the body near its base; they have but six eyes or fewer. Also called Dysderides and Dysderidae.

dysenteric, dysenterical (dis-en-ter'ik, -i-kal), a. [= F. dysentérique, dysentérique = Sp. disenterico = Pg. dysenterico = It. disenterico, dysenterico, < L. dysentericus, < Gr. δυσεντερικός, < δυσεντερία, dysentery; see dysentery.] 1. Pertaining to, of the nature of, accompanied by, or resulting from dysentery: as, dysenteric symptoms or effects. 2. Suffering from dysentery: as, a dysenteric patient.

dysenterious (dis-en-tē'ri-ūs), a. [< dysentery + -ous.] Same as dysenteric. [Rare.]

All will be but as delicate meats dressed for a dysenterious person, that can relish nothing. Gabel.

dysentery (dis'en-ter-i), n. [Formerly dysentery; < F. dysentérie, dysentérie = Sp. disenteria = Pg. dysenteria = It. disenteria, dysenteria = D. dysentérie = G. dysenteria = Dan. Sw. dysenteri, < L. dysenteria, < Gr. δυσεντερία, dysentery, < δυσεντερία, suffering in the bowels, < δύνω, bad, ill, + εντερία, pl. εντερα, the bowels; see entero.] A disease characterized by inflammation of the mucous membrane of the large intestine, mucous, bloody, and difficult evacuations, and more or less fever.

dysepulotic (dis-ep-i-lot'ik), a. [< Gr. δύνω, hard, + επυλῶ, q. v.] In surg., not healing or cicatrizing readily or easily: as, a dysepulotic wound.

dysæsthesia, dysæsthetic. See dysæsthesia, dysæsthetic.

dysgenesis (dis-jē-nēs'ik), a. [< dysgenesis + -ic.] Breeding with difficulty; sterile; infertile; barren. Darwin.

dysgenesis (dis-jē-nēs'is), n. [NL., < Gr. δύνω, hard, + γενεά, generation.] Difficulty in breeding; difficult generation; sterility; infertility.

Dysidea (di-aid'ē-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. δύνω, hard, bad, + ἰδέα, form; see idea.] A genus of sponges, typical of the family Dysideidae. Also Dysideia.

Dysidolia (dis-i-dō-lī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dys- + idol-.] A family of fibrous sponges.

Dysidrosis (dis-i-drō-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. dys-, hard, + idros, sweat, perspiration, < idōr (√ idh*) = E. sweat.] A disease of the sweat-follicles, in which they become distended with the retained secretion.

Dysis (dī'sis), n. [ML., also disis, < Gr. dysis, setting of the sun or stars (< dysis < dōr, the west), < diew, sink, dive, set.] In astrology, the seventh house of the heavens, which relates to love, litigation, etc.

Dyskinesia (dis-ki-nō-si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. dyskinesis, < dys-, hard, + kinesis, movement, < kinēō, move.] In pathol., impaired power of voluntary movement.

Dyslalia (dis-lā-lī-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. dys-, hard, + laleō, speak.] In pathol., difficulty of utterance dependent on malformation or imperfect innervation of the tongue and other organs of articulation; slow or difficult speech.

Dyslexia (dis-lek-si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. dys-, hard, + lēxis, a speaking, speech, word; see lexicon.] See the extract.

Dr. R. Berthol . . . describes under the name dyslexia a novel psychic affection related to "alexia," or word-blindness, but differing from it in that the patients can read a few lines, but apparently get no sense from their reading and give it up in despair.

Ann. Jour. Psychol., 1, 648.

Dyslogistic (dis-lō-jis-tik), a. [dyslogy + -istic (after eulogistic, < eulogy). Cf. Gr. dyslogos, hard to compute, also ill-calculating, misguided.] Conveying censure, disapproval, or opprobrium; censorious; opprobrious.

Ask Reus for the motive which gave birth to the prosecution on the part of Actor; the motive of course is the most obvious that can be found: desire of gain, if it be a case which opens a door to gain; if not, enmity, though not under that neutral and unimpassioned, but under the name of revenge or malice, or some other such dyslogistic name.

Bentham, Judicial Evidence, 1, 8.

Any respectable scholar, even if dyslogistic were new to him, would see at a glance that dyslogistic must be a mistake for it, and that the right word must be the reverse of eulogistic. The paternity of dyslogistic—no bantling, but now almost a centenarian—is adjudged to that genius of common-sense, Jeremy Bentham.

F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 309.

Gossips came to mean intimate friends; next, gossip meant the light, familiar talk of such friends; and, finally, with a dyslogistic connotation, any frivolous conversation.

W. E. Hearn, Arrian Household, p. 291.

Dyslogistically (dis-lō-jis-ti-kāl-i), adv. In a dyslogistic manner; so as to convey censure or disapproval.

Accordingly he [Kant] is not down as a "Transcendentalist," and all the loose connotation of that term, as it is now dyslogistically employed among us, is thought to be applicable to him.

T. H. Green, in Academy.

Dyslogy (dis-lō-jī), n. [dys-, bad, ill, + -logy, < lōgōs, speak; after Gr. lōgōs, E. etymology, of opposite meaning.] Dispraise: the opposite of eulogy.

In the way of eulogy and dyslogy and summing up of character there may doubtless be a great many things set forth concerning this Mirabeau.

Carlyle, Misc., IV, 117.

Dyslute (dis-lū-it), n. [dys-, bad, + luteo, loosen, + -ite.] A name given to a variety of garnet, or zine-spinel, from Sussex county, New Jersey, containing a small percentage of manganese: so named because difficult to dissolve.

Dysmenorrhœa, dysmenorrhœa (dis-men-ō-rō-ā), n. [NL. dysmenorrhœa, < Gr. dys-, hard, + men, a month, + orrhœa, a flowing.] In pathol., difficult or laborious menstruation; catamenial discharges accompanied with much local pain, especially in the loins.

Dysmenorrhœal, dysmenorrhœal (dis-men-ō-rō-ā), a. [dysmenorrhœa, < dysmenorrhœa, + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or connected with dysmenorrhœa: as, the dysmenorrhœal membrane which is sometimes discharged from the uterus.

Dysmerism (dis-me-rizm), n. [dys-, bad, + meros, part (division), + -ism.] An aggregation of unlike parts; a process or result of dysmerogenesis; a kind of merism opposed to eumerism.

Dysmeristic (dis-me-ris-tik), a. [As dysmerism + -istic.] Having the character or quality of dysmerism; irregularly repeated in a set of more or less unlike parts whose relations to one another, or origin one from another, is disguised; dysmerogenetic: opposed to eumeristic. See extract under dysmerogenesis.

Dysmerogenesis (dis-me-rō-jen-ē-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. dys-, bad, + meros, part (division), + genesis, generation.] The genesis, origination, or production of many unlike parts, or of parts in irregular series or at irregular times, which together form an integral whole; dysmeristic generation; repetition of forms with adaptive modification or functional specialization; a kind of merogenesis opposed to eumerogenesis.

The tendency to bad formation . . . has all along acted concurrently with a powerful synthetic tendency, so that new units have from the first made but a gradual and disguised appearance. This is dysmerogenesis, and such aggregates as exhibit it may be called dysmeristic.

Empe. Brit., XII, 655.

Dysmerogenetic (dis-me-rō-jen-ē-tik), a. [dysmerogenesis, after genetic.] Produced by or resulting from dysmerogenesis; characterized by or exhibiting dysmerism; dysmeristic: opposed to eumerogenetic.

Dysmeromorph (dis-me-rō-mōrf), n. [dys-, bad, + meros, part (see dysmerism), + morphē, shape.] An organic form resulting from dysmerogenesis; a dysmeristic organism: opposed to eumeromorph.

Synthesized eumeromorph simulates normal dysmeromorph, analyzed dysmeromorph simulates normal eumeromorph.

Empe. Brit., XII, 655.

Dysmeromorphic (dis-me-rō-mōrf-ik), a. [dysmeromorph + -ic.] Having the character or quality of a dysmeromorph; dysmerogenetic or dysmeristic in form: opposed to eumeromorphic.

Dysnomy (dis-nō-mī), n. [dys-, bad, + nomos, law, lessness, a bad constitution, < dysnomos, lawless, < dys-, bad, + nomos, law.] Bad legislation; the enactment of bad laws.

Dysodile (dis-ō-dil), n. [dys-, bad, + odōr, ill-smelling (< dys-, ill, + odōr, smell, akin to odor, smell), + -ile.] A kind of greenish- or yellowish-gray coat occurring in masses made up of foliaceous layers, which when burning emits a very fetid odor. It is a product of the decomposition of combined vegetable and animal matters. It was first observed at Meili in Sicily and has also been found at several places in Germany and France.

Dysodont (dis-ō-dont), a. [dys-, bad, + odont (< odont) = E. tooth.] In conch., having obsolete or irregular hinge-teeth; specifically, of or pertaining to the Dysodonta.

Dysodonta (dis-ō-dont-ā), n. pl. [NL., pl. of dysodont; see dysodont.] A group or order of bivalve mollusks having obsolete or irregular hinge-teeth, muscular impressions unequal or reduced to one, and palatal line entire. It corresponds to the Monomyaria.

Dysodus (dis-ō-dus), n. [NL., irr. g. < Gr. dys-, bad, + odont = E. tooth.] A generic name bestowed by Cope upon the Japanese pug-dog, called Dysodus prasinus, characterized by such degradation of the dentition that there may be in all but 16 teeth (no incisors, 1 canine in each half-jaw, 1 premolar and 1 molar in each upper, and 2 premolars and 2 molars in each lower half-jaw), thus exemplifying actual evolution of a generic form by "artificial selection" of comparatively few years' duration.

Dysotocia (dis-ō-tō-si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. dys-, ill, + otocia, a laying of eggs, < otocia, laying eggs, < ōtō (= l. otum, egg, + tekōō, tekōō, produce, bear.) In zool., difficult ovulation.

Dysopia (dis-ō-pi-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. dysopia, confusion of face (taken in the def. in another sense), < dys-, bad, ill, + ōpō (< ōpō), eye, face.] Same as dysopia.

Dysopsia (dis-ō-pi-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. dys-, bad, + opsis, view, sight.] In pathol., painful or defective vision.

Dysopsy (dis-ō-pi-ā), n. [dys-, bad, ill, + opsis, sight.] Same as dysopsia.

Dysorexia (dis-ō-rēk-si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. dysorexia, feebleness of appetite, < dys-, bad, + orexis, appetite.] In pathol., a deprived or failing appetite.

Dysorexy (dis-ō-rēk-si-ā), n. Same as dysorexia.

Dyspareunia (dis-pā-rē-ni-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. dys-, hard, + pareunia, lying beside, < para, beside, + erō, bed.] In pathol., inability to perform the sexual act without pain: usually applied to females.

Dyspepsia (dis-pep-si-ā), n. [Also dyspepsy; = F. dyspepie = Sp. dyspepsia = Pg. dyspepsia, < L. dyspepsia, < Gr. dyspepsia, indigestion, < dys-, hard to digest, < dys-, hard, + pepsis, verbal adj. of pepsis, ripen, soften, cook, digest, = L. coquere, cook; see coq.] Impaired power of digestion. The term is applied with a certain freedom to all forms of gastric derangement, whether involving impaired power of digestion or not. But it is usually discarded when some more definite diagnosis can be made, as gastric cancer, gastric ulcer, gastritis, gastroenteritis or when it depends on poisonous ingesta or appears as a feature of some other disease, especially if that is acute. Functional dyspepsia, also called atonic and nervous dyspepsia, is gastric derangement, not exclusively neuralgic, which may involve a diminished or an excessive secretion of the gastric juice, or diminished or excessive acidity in that secretion, or an irritability of the stomach-walls or an impairment of their motor functions, and which appears to depend on some defect in the innervation of the stomach, and not on some grosser lesion.

Dyspepsy (dis-pep-si-ā), n. Same as dyspepsia.

Dyspeptic (dis-pep-tik), a. and n. [= F. dyspeptique, < Gr. as if dyspeptikos*, < dys-, bad, dyspepsia; see dyspepsia.] 1. a. 1. Pertaining to or of the nature of dyspepsia: as, a dyspeptic complaint. — 2. Suffering from or afflicted with dyspepsia or indigestion: as, a dyspeptic person. — 3. Characteristic of one afflicted with chronic dyspepsia; hence, bilious; morbid; "blue"; pessimistic; misanthropic: as, a dyspeptic view or opinion.

II. n. A person afflicted with dyspepsia.

Dyspeptical (dis-pep-ti-kāl), a. [dyspeptic + -al.] Troubled with dyspepsia; hence, inclined to morbid or pessimistic views of things.

How seldom will the outward capability of the inward; though talented wonderfully enough, we are poor, unfriended, dyspeptical, bashful; nay, what is worse than all, we are foolish.

Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, p. 83.

Dysphagia (dis-fa-jī-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. as if dysphagia*, < dys-, hard, + phagō, eat.] In pathol., difficulty in swallowing. Also dysphagy.

Dysphagic (dis-fa-jī-ik), a. Pertaining to, of the nature of, or affected with dysphagia.

Dysphagy (dis-fa-jī-ā), n. [= F. dysphagie; < NL. dysphagia; see dysphagia.] Same as dysphagia.

Dysphonia (dis-fō-ni-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. dysphonia, roughness of sound, < dys-, ill-sounding, < dys-, ill, + phōnē, sound.] In pathol., difficulty in producing vocal sounds.

Dysphony (dis-fō-ni-ā), n. [= F. dysphonie; < NL. dysphonia; see dysphonia.] Same as dysphonia.

Dysphoria (dis-fō-rī-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. dysphoria, pain hard to be borne, anguish, < dys-, hard to bear, < dys-, hard, + phōrō, < phōrō = E. heart.] In pathol., impatience under affliction; a state of dissatisfaction, restlessness, fretting, or inquietude.

Dysphuistic (dis-fū-is-tik), a. [dys-, bad, + -phuistic as in euphuistic, q. v.] Ill-sounding; inelegant.

Of A Lover's Complaint . . . I have only space or need to remark that it contains two of the most exquisitely Shakespearean verses ever vouchsafed to us by Shakespeare, and two of the most exuberantly euphuistic or dysphuistic lines ever inflicted on us by man.

Newburys, Shakespeare, p. 62.

Dyspnoea (disp-nē-ā), n. [L., < Gr. dyspnœa, difficulty of breathing, < dys-, want of, want of breath, short-breathed, < dys-, hard, + pnœa; cf. pnœa, breathing, < pnœa, breathe.] In pathol., difficulty of breathing; difficult or labored respiration.

Dyspnœal (disp-nē-āl), a. [dyspnœa + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of dyspnoea; connected with dyspnoea.

Dyspnœic (disp-nē-ik), a. [L. dyspnœicus, n., a short of breath, < Gr. dyspnœikos, short of breath, < dys-, want of, want of breath, < dys-, hard, + pnœa, breathing, < pnœa, breathe.] Affected with or resulting from dyspnoea; dyspnœal.

Dysporomorph (dis-pō-rō-mōrf), n. One of the Dysporomorphæ.

Dysporomorphæ (dis-pō-rō-mōrf-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Dysporus + Gr. morphē, form.] In Huxley's system of classification (1867), a division of desmognathous birds, exactly corresponding to the Steganopodæ, Totipalmatæ, or our-footed notaturnal birds. They have all four toes webbed, the clawed accounted by a circle of feathers, the sternum broad and truncate posteriorly, the mandibular angle truncate, the maxillopalatines large and spongy, the united palatine carinate, and no basipterygoid process. The division includes the plicifera, gannets, cormorants, frigates, darters, and tropic birds.

Dysporomorphie (dis-pō-rō-mōrf-ē), a. [dysporomorphæ + -ic.] Belonging to or resembling the Dysporomorphæ; totipalmate; steganopodous.

Dysporus (dis-pō-rus), n. [NL. (Illiger, 1811: so called with reference to the closure or obliteration of the nostrils), < Gr. dysporos, hard to pass, difficult, < dys-, hard, + poros, passage.] A genus of gannets: same as Sula. It is often separated from Sula to designate the brown gannets, as the S. leucos, S. fuscus as distinguished from the white ones, as S. bassani.

Dysyscus (dis-ī-kus), n.; pl. dysysci (-si). [NL., < Gr. dys-, bad, + yscus, a fig.] Hæckel's name for a form of sponge also called rhagon.

Dysteological (dis-tel-ō-jī-ik), a. [dys-, bad, + teleology + -ic.] Purposeless; without design; having no "final cause" for being; not teleological.

dysteleologist (dis-tel-ə-jol'ō-jist), n. [< dys-teleology + -ist] One who believes in dysteleology

Dysteleologist without admitting a purpose, had not felt the call of duty to deny the fact

Ward Dynam Sociol, I 173

dysteleology (dis-tel-ə-jol'ō-jī), n. [< (dis) + telos (tele), end, purpose, + -ology, < Gr. telos, speak, see teleology] The science of rudimentary or vestigial organs, apparently functionless or of no use or purpose in the economy of the organism, with reference to the doctrine of purposelessness. The idea is that many use as or even harmful parts may be present in an organism in obedience to the law of heredity simply, and that such have evidence of the lack of design or purpose or final cause which the doctrine of teleology requires

The Doctrine of Purposelessness — Dysteleology

Haeckel, Evolution of Man (trans.) I 109

It is no wonder that Mr. Roman should have written that inability to understand why the phenomena of nature should be more fatal to the doctrine of Dysteleology than any other of the phenomena of nature

Fortnightly, N. S. XXXIX 6

Dysteria (dis-tē'ri-ā), n. [NL. < Gr. dys-, hard + -ypia, watch, have an eye on, keep, cf. dysopycus, hard to keep] The typical genus of Dysteriidae. D. armata of Huxley, which inhabits salt water, has such a structure that it has to be supported by glass to be kept alive

Dysteriidae (dis-tē'ri-ā-dē), n. pl. [NL. < Dysteria + -idae] A family of free swimming animalcules, more or less ovate, cylindrical, flattened or compressed, and mostly cucurbitate. They have the carapace simple or consisting of two lateral subequal, of one or of two lateral subequal, confined to the margin of the dorsal or ventral surface, the dorsal surface follows by a distinct pharynx, the walls of which are strengthened by a simple horny tube, by a cylindrical fascicle of cartilage rods, or by otherwise differentiated thin nucleic elements, conspicuous tall like styl, or compact fascicle of setae, thus presenting a styl-like aspect, projecting from the posterior extremity. Most of them inhabit salt water

Dysterina (dis-tē'ri-nā), n. pl. [NL. < Dysteria + -ina] A family of minute infusorians typified by the genus Dysteria. Chaparede and Lachmann, 1858-60. See Dysteriidae

dythesia (dis-thē'si-ā), n. [NL. < Gr. dythēsis, a bad condition, < dythēsis, in bad condition, see dythēsis] In pathol, a non febrile morbid state of the blood-vessels, a bad habit of body dependent mainly upon the state of the circulating system

dythetic (dis-thet'ik), a. [< Gr. dythētic, in bad case, in bad condition, < dythēsis, bad, + -etic, verbal adj. of -ethēsis, put, place] Of, pertaining to, or characterized by dythesia dythymic (dis-thim'ik), a. [< Gr. dythymia, melancholy, < dythymia, despondency, despair, < dythēsis, bad, + -thymia, spirit, courage] In pa

thol, affected with despondency; depressed in spirits; dejected dystocia (dis-tō'si-ā), n. [NL. < Gr. dystokia, a painful delivery, < dystokos, bringing forth with pain, < dys-, hard, + tokos, to give, bring forth] In pathol, difficult parturition. Also dystokia dystome (dis-tō'mē), a. Same as dystomie

dystomic, dystomous (dis-tō'm'ik, dis-tō'mus), a. [< Gr. dystomus, hard to cut (but taken in pass. sense 'badly cleft'), < dys-, hard, bad, + tomē, verbal adj. of tomos, cut] In mineral, having an imperfect fracture or cleavage dystrophic (dis-trof'ik), a. [< dystrophy + -ic] Pertaining to a perversion of nutrition dystrophy (dis-tro'fī), n. [< Gr. dys-, hard, ill + -trophē, nourishment, < trophē, nourish] In pathol, perverted nutrition dysuria (dis-ū'ri-ā), n. [IL. < Gr. dysuria, < dys-, hard, + ousia, urine] In pathol, difficulty in micturition, attended with pain and scalding. Also dysury dysuric (dis-ū'rik), a. [< dysuria + -ic] Pertaining to or of the nature of dysuria, affected with dysuria dysury (dis-ū'ri), n. Same as dysuria

Dytes (di'tēz), n. [NL. (Kaup, 1829), < Gr. dytes, a diver, < dyta, dive] A genus of small grubs, of the family Podicepsidae, containing such species as the horned and the eared grubs

Dytiscidae, n. pl. See Dytiscida

Dytiscus, n. See Dytiscus

dytiscid (di-tis'it), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Dytiscida

II. n. A water beetle of the family Dytiscida

Dytiscidae, Dytiscidæ (di-tis'it-dē), n. pl. [NL. < Dytiscus, Dytiscus, + -idae] A family of two-eyed aquatic and phagous Coleoptera, or predatory beetles, having the metasternum destitute of an antecoxal piece, but prolonged in a triangular process posteriorly, the antennae slender, filiform, or setaceous, and the abdomen with six segments. The Dytiscidae differ from the Hydrophilidae and Carabidae but differ in the form of the metasternum and in the structure of the legs which are adapted for swimming. The water beetles are mostly of moderate size, with narrowly oval or pear-shaped bodies and a like hind legs, but the Dytiscidae are of various shapes Dytiscus, Dyticus (di-tis'kus, dit'ik-us), n. [NL. orig. and commonly Dytiscus (Linnaeus), Dytiscus (Gyllenhal, 1764) < Gr. dytes, able to dive, < dyta, a diver, < dyta, dive, sink, get into, enter] The typical genus of predaceous water beetles of the family Dytiscida, having the metasternal spiracles covered by the elytra, the front tarsi five-jointed, and pectinate in the male, and the hind tarsi not ciliate, with the claws equal. The number of segments are large, but difficult to distinguish. They are dark olive green above, the thorax and elytra being often margined with yellow. The elytra are smooth in the male, usually serrate in the female

D. marginalis (Linnaeus) is very abundant in Europe, inhabiting, like the other species, large bodies of stagnant water. Some species are called water butts

dyvour (di-vūr), n. [< Sc. also dyvon, diver, < I. dyvon, a duty, obligation, etc., see dyver and dyvor] In old Scots law, a bankrupt who had made a cessio bonorum to his creditors

Lois, what reck I by thee,
Or Gorda on his o'can?
Dyvor, dyvour, sons to me—
I reckon in Jeanie a bonom

Burns

dzereen, dzeron (dzer'en, -ron), n. [Mongol. name] The Chinese antelope, Procapra gutturosa, a remarkably swift animal, inhabiting the arid deserts of central Asia, Tibet, China, and southern Siberia. It is nearly 4½ feet long, and is 2½ feet high at the shoulder. When alarmed it clears over 20 feet in one bound. Also called goitered antelope dziggetai (dzig'ge-tai), n. [Mongol. name] The wild ass of Asia, Equus hemionus, whose habits are graphically recorded in the book of Job, and which is believed to be the hemionus of Herodotus and Pliny. It is intermediate in appearance and character between the horse and the ass (hence the specific name hemionus, half-ass). The males especially are the animals standing as high as 14 hands. It lives in small herds and is an inhabitant of the sandy steppes of central Asia to 6000 feet above sea level. The dziggetai or hemionus is one of several closely related species or more probably varieties of large wild Asiatic asses which appear to have the black stripes across the withers. Two of these are sometimes distinguished under the names of kulan (Equus kulan) a wild ranging form and khang (E. khang) of Tibet. See ganger phus and thaur. Also spelled dziggetai and in other ways

Dziggetai (Equus hemionus)

Active scheme of forms (like that given for the preceding letters) is as follows:

1. The fifth letter and second vowel in our alphabet. It has the same place in the order of the alphabet as the corresponding sign or character in the older alphabets, Latin and Greek and Phœnician, from which ours is derived (see A); but the value originally attached to the sign has undergone much modification. The comparative scheme of forms (like that given for the preceding letters) is as follows:

From the capital E have come by gradual modification and variation (as in the case of the other letters) all the other printed and written forms. The value of the sign in the Phœnician alphabet was and still is that of an aspirate, a peculiar smooth h. But when the alphabet was adapted to Greek use, this unnecessary aspirate-sign was utilized as a sign for a vowel-sound, either short or long, being nearly that instanced in our two words met and they. This double value in point of quantity it had in all early Greek use, and until in one section of the Greek race - and later, after their example, in all the others - it was found convenient to distinguish the long sound by a separate sign, H (see H), after which the E was restricted to denoting the short sound, as in our met. This distinction was not introduced into the Italian alphabet; hence the same sign stands for both short and long sound in Latin, and with us. The name of the sign in Phœnician was he (of doubtful meaning; usually explained as "window"); in Greek it was ē, and later ē (simple e) - it is believed, in antithesis to the double ē, which then had the same sound. In most of the languages of Europe the sign has retained its original Greek and Latin value; in the English it has done this only so far as concerns the short sound, the long sound has, in the history of the changes of pronunciation, so generally passed over into what was originally the long sound, that we now call this sound long e (as in met, meat, meat, etc.). The proper e sound (in met, they) is phonetically a medium between the completely open a of father and the close sound i of pages. In its two quantities (met, they) it constitutes about five per cent of English utterance. Taking into account also the numerous digraphs, as ea, ee, ey, ae, ie, oe, in which it is found, and its frequent occurrence as a silent letter, e is the most used of our alphabetic signs. This frequency is due in considerable measure to the general reduction of the vowels of endings to e that constitutes a conspicuous part of the change from Anglo-Saxon to English. The total loss, then, of many of these endings in utterance has left numerous cases of silent final e, to which others have been added by analogy with these. A degree of value in the economy of our written speech belongs to it, in so far as its occurrence after a single consonant now almost regularly indicates the long sound of the vowel preceding that consonant, as in mate, mete, mite, note, nute; but in many cases it appears also after a single consonant preceded by a short vowel, and such cases, as agine live, have, reunited, constitute one of the classes where reforma in orthography is most easily made, and has most to recommend it. (See e.) E has further come to be used as an orthographic auxiliary, in some cases after e and a, where it is conventionally regarded as preserving the so-called "soft" sound of those letters, as in penumbra, manipulable.

2. As a numeral, 250. In Cantabrigia. - 3. As a symbol: (a) In the calendar, the fifth of the dominical letters. (b) In logic, the sign of the universal negative proposition. See A1, 2 (b). (c) In alg.: (1) [cap.] The operation of enlargement: thus, $Efx = f(x + 1)$; also, the greatest integer as small as the quantity which follows: thus, $E_3 = 3$. (2) [l. c.] The base of the Napierian system of logarithms; also, the eccentricity of a conic. - 4. In music: (a) The key-note of the major key of four sharps, having the signature (1), or of the minor key of one sharp, having the signature (2); also, the final of the Phrygian mode in medieval music. (b) In the fixed system of solmization, the third tone of the scale, called re; hence so named by French musicians. (c) On the keyboard of the pianoforte, the white key to the right of every group of two black keys. (d) The tone given by such a key, or a tone in unison with such a tone. (e) The degree of a staff assigned to such a key or tone; with the treble clef, the lower line and upper space (3). (f) A note on such a degree, indicating such a key or tone (4). - 5. As an abbreviation: (a) East: as, E. by S., east by south. See S. E., E. S. E., etc. (b) In various phrase-abbreviations. See e. g., i. e., E. and O. K., etc. E. dur., the key of E major. E. moll., the key of E minor.

6-1. A prefix of Anglo-Saxon origin, one of the forms of the original prefix ge-. It remains unsifted in enough. See e-.

6-2. [l. c., e, reduced form of ex-, ex- see ex-.] A prefix of Latin origin, a reduced form of ex-, alternating with ex- before consonants, as in evade, elude, emit, etc. See ex-. In some scientific terms it denotes negation or privation, like Greek a- privative (being then conventionally called a- privative) as, acaudate, tailless, amorous, edentate, toothless, etc. In slope the prefix is an assimilated form of Dutch ont-.

6-3. [ME. en-, en-, en-, en-, en-, en-, etc.] The unpronounced termination of many English words. silent final e is of various origin, being the common representative pronounced in earlier English of almost all the Anglo-Saxon Old French Latin, etc., in flexion endings. In nouns and adjectives of native origin it may be regarded as representing the original vowel ending of the nominative as in ale, tale, stake, lake, etc.; or more generally, the original oblique e case ending, etc.; which from their greater frequency became in Middle English the accepted form of the nominative also as in lake, pole, rule, wife, etc.; similarly, in words of Latin and other origin, as rule, rule, rule, rule, etc. In words of native origin e represents the original infinitive (AS. an ME. en, e) mixed with the present indicative en as in make, write, etc. In a great number of words the e has disappeared as an actual sound, the letter being retained, as a result of phonetic and orthographic accident, as a conventional sign of length - an accented vowel followed by a single consonant before final silent e being regularly "long, as in write, rule, lake, etc.; words distinguished thus from forms with a "short" vowel, rat, vert, rod, tab, etc. In words of recent introduction e is used whenever this distinction is to be made. In some cases the vowel preceding e is itself a vowel, live, hath, have, golden, rainbow, etc.; especially in polysyllables, as die, due, etc. e is also found, as in apology, etc.; but some of these words were formerly or are now often spelled without the superfluous e, as bal, algebra, abun, de point, etc. Etymologically, final e in modern English has no weight or value, it being a mere chance whether it represents an original vowel or syllable.

6-4. [F. -e, fem. -e, pp. suffix, CL. -atus, -ata; see -ate.] A French suffix, the termination of perfect participles, and of adjectives and nouns thence derived, some of which are used, though consciously as French words, in English, as protégé, négligé, retained, degraded, carried, etc. The Anglicized form is -ed (which see).

ea. A common English digraph, introduced about the beginning of the sixteenth century, having then the sound of u, and serving to distinguish e or ee with that sound from e or ee with the sound of e. The original sound is retained in most of the words having ea until the eighteenth century, and still prevails in break, great, mean, and in a dialectal ("Irish") pronunciation of least, pleas, mean, etc. (which in dialect writing are spelled leat, pleat, meant) to represent this pronunciation see ea. It has become in bread, dead, head, meadow, leat, leat, leat, leat, leat, etc., and, modified by the following, leat, leat, leat, leat, leat, leat, leat, leat, etc. In most words, however, the digraph ea now agrees in sound with e, as in read, pronounced the same as red (but the perfect read like red). The most common digraph ea has become then with the Anglo-Saxon and early Middle English diphthong of "breaking" ea, though it happens to replace it in some words, as in head (Anglo-Saxon heaf lead Anglo-Saxon lead), cart (Anglo-Saxon carra).

As if it fed ye!

Shak., Hen. VIII, III, 2.

To the holy war how fast and eagerly did men go!

South, Sermons.

eagerness (ē'gēr-nēs), n. 1t. Tartness; sourness; sharpness.—2. Keen or vehement desire in the pursuit or for the attainment of something, or a manifestation of such desire; ardent tendency; zeal; fervor: as, to pursue happiness or wealth with eagerness; eagerness of manner or speech.

She knew her distance, and did angle for me,

Maddling my eagerness with her restraint.

Shak., All's Well, v, 3.

The eagerness and strong bent of the mind after knowledge, if not warily regulated, is often an hindrance to it.

Locke.

What we call our despair is often only the painful eagerness of unful hope.

George Eliot, Middlemarch, II, 81.

—Syn. 2. Earnestness, Ardidity, Eagerness, Zeal, Enthusiasm, ardor, vehemence, impetuosity, heartiness, longing, impatience. The first five words may all denote strong and worthy movements of feeling and purpose toward a desired object. In this field eagerness has either a physical or a moral application; with ardidity the physical application is primary, earnestness, zeal, and enthusiasm have only the moral sense. Ardidity represents a desire for food primarily physical, figuratively mental: as, to read a new novel with ardidity; it rarely goes beyond that degree of extension. Eagerness emphasizes an intense desire, generally for specific things, although it may stand also as a trait of character; it tends to produce a corresponding keenness in the pursuit of its object. Earnestness denotes a more sober feeling, proceeding from reason, conviction of duty, or the less violent emotions, but likely to prove stronger and more permanent than any of the others. The word has at times a special reference to effort; it implies solidity, sincerity, energy, and conviction of the laudableness of the object sought; it is contrasted with eagerness in that it affects the whole character. Zeal is by derivation a bubbling up with heat; it is naturally, therefore, an active quality, passionate and yet generally sustained, an abiding ardor or fervent devotion in any unselfish cause. Enthusiasm is so far redeemed from its early suggestion of extravagance that it denotes presumably a trait of character more general than eagerness or zeal, more lively than earnestness, a lofty quickness of feeling and purpose in the pursuit of laudable things under the guidance of reason and conscience; thus it differs from zeal, which still generally implies a poorly balanced judgment.

The nobles in great earnestness are going

All to the senate-house

Shak., Cor., IV, 6.

Thou' her some modern works . . . all these she read with ardidity.

Charlotte Brontë, The Professor, xviii.

So Gawain, looking at the villainy done,

Farore, but in his heat and eagerness

Trembled and quivered.

Tennyson, Pelleas and Ettarre.

It was the sense that the cause of education was the cause of religion itself that inspired Alfred and Istanan alike with their zeal for teaching.

J. E. Green, Conq. of Eng., p. 225.

Truth is never to be expected from authors whose understandings are warped with enthusiasm; for they judge all actions—and their causes, by their own perverse principles, and a crooked line can never be the measure of a straight one.

Druden, 3ed. of Plutarch's Lives.

There is a certain enthusiasm in liberty, that makes human nature the above itself in acts of bravery and heroism.

A. Hamilton, Works, II, 116.

eagle (ē'gl), n. [Early mod. E. also egle: < ME. egle, < OF. egle, aigle, F. aigle = Pr. aigla = Sp. agula = Pr. agula = It. aquila, < L. aquila, an eagle (prob. so called from its dark-brown color), fem. of aquilus, dark-colored, brown (cf. Lith. akilas, blind); see Aquila, aquila, etc.] 1. Properly, a very large diurnal raptorial bird of the family Falconidae and genus Aquila (which see), having the feet feathered to the toes, and no tooth to the bill, which is straight for the length of the cere. There are about 9 species, all confined to the old world except the golden eagle, Aquila chrysaetos, which ranges also in North America. This is the type-species, to which the term originally attached; it is at least or more in length, of a dark-brown color, deriving the epithet golden from the ruddy-brown feathers of the back of the neck. It preys on lambs, hares, rabbits, various birds, such as grouse, and carrion. Other notable species are the imperial eagle, A. haliacea; the Russian eagle, A. magnificus; the spotted eagle, A. maculata (or nervosa). From its size, strength, rapacity, and powers of flight and vision, the eagle has been called the king of birds; but its prowess is greatly exaggerated. By the ancients it was called the bird of Jove, and it was borne on the Roman standards. Many nations, as France under the Bonapartes, Austria, Prussia, and Russia, have adopted it as the national emblem. In heraldry it ranks as one of the most noble bearings in coat-armour.

There might men the ryal egle fynde,

That with his sharpe lok perseth the sunne;

And other eyles of a lowre kynde,

Of which that clerks wel devyne kunne.

Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 330.

So the struck eagle, stretched upon the plain,

No more through rolling clouds to soar again,

View'd his own feather on the fatal dart,

And wing'd the shaft that quiver'd in his heart.

Byron, English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, l. 826.

2. A member of the genus Haliaeetus, which comprises the fishing-eagles, sea-eagles, or earnas, resembling the eagle proper in size and form, but having the shank bare of feathers and scaly: such as the white- or bald-headed eagle, or bald eagle, H. leucocephalus, the national emblem of the United States; the white-tailed eagle, H. albicilla; the pelagic eagle, H. pelagicus, etc.—3. A name of many raptorial birds larger than the hawk and the buzzard, only distantly related, as the harpy eagle, booted eagle, etc. A number of genera of such large hawks are sometimes grouped with the true eagles in a subfamily Aquilinae (which see).

4. [cap.] An ancient northern constellation between Cygnus and Sagittarius, containing the bright star Altair. It seems to be shown on Babylonian stones of high antiquity, and the statement still current that it almost touches the equinoctial refers to the position of that circle about 2000 B. C. At present the constellation, enlarged by the addition of Antinous shortly after the Christian era, extends 20° north and 18° south of the equator. See Aquila, 2.

5. A military ensign or standard surmounted by the figure of an eagle. It is especially associated with ancient Rome, though borne, with various modifications, by certain modern nations, as France under the first and second empires.

This uttered, overboard he leaps, and with his Eagle felicitously advanced runs upon the Enemy.

Milton, Hist. Eng., II.

What! shall a Roman sink in soft repose,

And tamely see the Britons aid his foes?

See them secure the rebel Gaul supply;

Spurn his vain eagle and his power defy?

Longfellow, Cmai's Dream.

6. A lectern, usually of wood or brass, the upper part of which is in the shape of an eagle with outstretched wings supporting a book-rest, the eagle being the symbol of Saint John the Evangelist.

[The minister] read from the eagle.

Thackeray.

7. A gold coin of the United States, of the value of 10 dollars, weighing 258 grains troy, 900 fine, and equivalent to £2 1s. 1d. sterling.

—8. In arch., a name for a pediment.—9. In the game of roulette, a spot, outside the regular 36 numbers, upon which is the picture of an eagle.

If this is the winning number, the bank takes in all bets except those made on that particular one. See roulette. Also called eagle-bird.—American eagle. See bald eagle.—Bald eagle, or bald earn, a common though misapplied name for the white-headed eagle of North America, Haliaeetus leucocephalus. This is the eagle which has been adopted as the national emblem on the arms of the United States, and is figured on some of its coins; being popularly called "the American eagle," "the spread eagle," "the national bird," "the bird of freedom," etc.

It is about 3 feet long, dark-brown or blackish when adult, with pure-white head and tail; the shank is partly naked and yellow, by which mark the species may be distinguished in any plumage from the golden eagle, Aquila chrysaetos. Also called white- or bald-headed eagle. See cut on following page.—Black eagle. (a) The golden eagle, Aquila chrysaetos. (b) The young of the bald eagle, Haliaeetus leucocephalus.—Columbian eagle. See colunnet.—Fishing-eagle. Same as osprey. Golden eagle. See fig. 1.—Order of the Black Eagle, a Prussian order founded by Frederick I. in 1701. The number of knights is limited to 90, exclusive of the princes of the blood royal, and all must be of unquestioned nobility. The badge is a cross of 8 points, having in the center a circle with the monogram FE (for Fredericus Rex); the four arms are enameled red, with the eagle of Prussia in black enamel between each two arms. The ribbon is orange, but on occasions of ceremony the badge is worn pendant to a collar, consisting alternately of black eagles holding thunderbolts and medallions bearing the same monogram as the badge and also the monogram "Suum cuique."—Order of the Red Eagle (formerly Order of the Red Eagle of Bayreuth; also called Order of Sovereignty), an order founded by the Margrave of Bayreuth in 1706, and in 1792 adopted by Frederick William II. of Prussia on succeeding to the principality. The present insignia of the order are quite different from those of the original order. The badge is an s-pointed cross, having in the center a medallion with a red eagle bearing the arms of the Hohenzollern family. The arms of the cross are of white enamel, with an eagle of red enamel between each two arms. The ribbon is striped orange-color and white.—Order of the White Eagle, an order founded at the beginning of the eighteenth century by Augustus II. of Poland and Saxony, or, as is alleged, revived by him. It has been adopted by the Czar of Russia, and is composed of one class only. The badge is a cross of 8 points, bearing a white eagle in relief, and surmounted by an imperial crown. The ribbon is sky-blue, but on state occasions the badge is worn pendant to a collar of white eagles connected by plain gold links.—Spread eagle, an eagle with outspread wings; specifically, the emblem of the United States of America: often applied attributively to any loud, bombastic, boastful, and arrogant display of national or other sentiments, as, spread-eagle speech. See spread, p. 6, and spread-eagled.

eagle-eyed (ē'gl-īd), a. 1. Sharp-sighted, like an eagle.—2. Quick to discern; having acute intellectual vision.

Belonius states that Euresta or Eagle-fish was formerly its (the haddock's) English name. Day.

eagle-flighted (ē'gl-flī'ted), a. Flying like an eagle; mounting high. [Poetical.]

eagle-hawk (ē'gl-hāk), n. A hawk of the genus Morphnus, as the Guiana eagle-hawk, M. guianensis. G. Cuvier.

great horned owl (Bubo virginianus), n. 1. A name of the great horned owl of Europe, Bubo maximus, and hence of other large species of the same genus, as B. virginianus, the great horned owl of North America. See cut under Bubo. — 2. A name of sundry other large owls. Saxnison.

eagle-ray (é'gl-rū), n. 1. A large species of ray, Myliobatis aquila, a batoid fish of the family Myliobatidae, found in the Atlantic. The sides or pectoral fins are expanded in a wing-like form, and the jaws are paved with rows of hexagonal teeth, the median of which are of much greater breadth than length. 2. Any ray of the family Mylobostridae. These rays are immenely broad, owing to the development of the pectoral fins, and have a long, flexible tail, armed with one or more serrated apices. They inhabit for the most part tropical or warm seas.

eagle-eyed (ŏ'gl-sī'ted), a. Having strong sight, as an eagle.

What peremptory eagle-sighted eye
Dares look upon the heaven of her brow,
That is not blinded by her majesty?

eagless (ē'glez), n. [Eagle + -ess.] A female or hen eagle. Sherwood. [Rare.]

eaglestone (ē'gl-stōn), n. [Tr. of Gr. αἰτῆρας: see aitēras.] A variety of argillaceous oxid of iron, found in masses varying from the size of a walnut to that of a man's head. In form these masses are spherical, oval, or nearly reniform, or sometimes resemble a parallelopiped with rounded edges and angles. They have a rough surface, and are essentially composed of concentric layers. The nodules often embrace at the center a kernel or nucleus, sometimes movable, and always differing from the exterior in color, density, and fracture. To these hollow nodules the Greeks gave the name of eaglestones, from a notion that the eagle transported them to her nest to facilitate the laying of her eggs. Also called aitēras.

Whether the actives or eucalcstone bath that eminent property to promote delivery or to restrain abortion, respectively applied to lower or upward parts of the body, we shall not discourage common practice by our question.

Sir T. Browne, July, Em. H. 6.

eaglet (6'glet), n. [Earlier mod. E. also eylet; < F. aiglette, dim. of aigle, eagle; see eagle.] A young eagle; a little eagle. In heraldry, when three or more eagles are borne on an escutcheon they are usually called eaglets, and always so when they are borne upon an ordinary, as a bend, fesse, etc., or another bearing, or on a mantle.

The organ of hearing; the apparatus of audition; the acoustic sense-organ; any mechanism by which an animal receives the impact of sound-waves and perceives them as sound. In man and mammals generally the ear consists of an external ear, which comprises (1) the more or less funnel-shaped pinna and (2) the external auditory meatus; of a middle ear, ear-drum, or tympanum, closed from the external auditory meatus by the tympanic membrane, traversed by a chain of small bones, the auditory ossicles, named malleus, incus, and stapes, and communicating with the pharynx by the Eustachian tube; and of an internal ear, or labyrinth, the essential organ of hearing, containing the end-organs of the auditory nerve. The labyrinth consists of a complicated closed sac, the membranous labyrinth, lined with epithel-bone and lying in a roughly corresponding excavation in the petrous bone, the bony labyrinth. The membranous labyrinth contains a liquid fluid, the endolymph, and between the membranous labyrinth and the bony labyrinth is a similar liquid called perilymph. The auditory nerve, penetrating the bone by the internal auditory meatus, is distributed to the walls of the membranous labyrinth. The labyrinth is completely shut off from the tympanum, but there are two fenestrae or openings, closed by membranes in the tympanic wall of the bony labyrinth, and the foot of the stapes is applied to one of them. Sound-waves which impinge upon the tympanic membrane are transmitted across the tympanum by the chain of auditory ossicles,

And men who have the gift of playing on an instrument by ear are sometimes afraid to learn by rule, lest they should lose it.

J. H. Newman, Gram. of Assent, p. 323.

6. A careful or favorable hearing; attention; heed.

I cried unto God with my voice, . . . and he gave ear unto me.

Ps. lxxvii. 1.

I gave us good care, and do consider us well the taulke that passed, as any one did there.

Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 10.

Give every man thine ear, but few thy voice.

Shak., Hamlet, I. 3.

But the bigots and flatterers who had his ear gave him advice which he was but too willing to take.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

7. Disposition to listen; judgment; taste.

He laid his sense closer, and in fewer words, according to the style and ear of those times.

Sir J. Denham.

8. A part of any inanimate object having some likeness to the external ear. (a) A projection from the side of a vessel or utensil made to be used as a handle: as, the ears of a jar, pitcher, or other vessel.

Each bottle had a curling ear,
Through which the belt he drew,
And hung a bottle on each side,
To make his balance true.

Cooper, John Gilpin.

Shak., Lear, II. 1.

earl (eri), n. [ME. erl, earlier erl, erl, as a designation of rank, < AS. eorl, an earl, a nobleman of high rank, nearly equiv. to caldorman (see alderman); first in the Kentish laws, but its common use as a title and designation of office begins with the Scandinavian invasion, through the influence of the cognate Icel. Sw. Dan. jarl, Icel. orig. erl, in the earliest Scand. use a man above the rank of a 'churl' or churl, then, esp. as a Norw. and Dan. title, an earl; the earlier AS. use occurs only in poetry, erl, a man, esp. a warrior (pl. earlas, men, warriors, the people, as an army), = OS. erl, a man, = OHG. erl, only in proper names; cf. Heruli, Bruli, the LL. form of the name of a people of northern Germany, prob. 'the warriors,' OS. pl. erios, AS. eorlas, etc. Further origin unknown; it is impossible to derive erl from caldor, a chief, as has been suggested.] A British title of nobility designating a nobleman of the third rank, being that next below a marquis and next above a viscount. Earl was the highest title until 1387, when the first duke was created; and it fell to the third rank in 1380, on the creation of the title of marquis. The earl formerly had the government of a shire, and was called shirman. After the conquest, when their office was first made hereditary, earls were for a time called counts, and from them shires took the name of counties; the wife of an earl is still called countess. Earl is now a mere title, unconnected with territorial jurisdiction, so much so that several earls have taken as their titles their own names with the prefix Earl, as Earl Grey, Earl Spencer, Earl Russell. An earl's coronet consists of a richly chased circle of gold, having on its upper edge eight strawberry-leaves, alternating with eight pearls, each raised on a spike higher than the leaves, and with a cap, etc., as in a duke's coronet. See cut under coronet.

A Duke's eldest son is Earl, and all the rest of his sons are Barons, with the Addition of their Christian name, as Lord Thomas, Lord Henry.

My thanks and kinness,
Henceforth be erle: the first that ever Scotland
In such an honour nam'd. Shak., Macbeth, v. 7.

The government was entrusted to a magistrate with the title of Raldorman, or its Danish equivalent Earl.
K. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, I. 82.

The ancient dignity of the erl has in former chapters been traced throughout its history. In very few instances was the title annexed to a single town or castle.
Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 428.

Earl marshal, the eighth great officer of state in Great Britain. He is the head of the College of Arms (see Haralds College, under herald), determines all rival claims to arms, and grants armorial bearings, through the medium of the king-at-arms, to persons not possessed of hereditary arms. It is his duty also to direct all great ceremonies of state, and to make the formal proclamation of war or peace. The office was formerly of great importance, and was originally conferred by grant of the king (as early as the time of Richard II.), but is now hereditary in the family of the Howards, dukes of Norfolk, called the premier earls of England. (See marshal.) There were formerly also earls marshals in Scotland. See marshals.

earlet (er'let), n. [ME. erlet, < erl + -let.] 1. A small ear.—2. An ear-ring.

And he said to them: I desire one request of you; give me the earlets of your apolls. For the lemmetles were accustomed to wear golden earlets.
Judges viii. 21 (Douay version).

3. In bot., an auricle, as in certain fallows Hepatica.

earlid (er'lid), n. [ME. erlid, < erl + lid. Cf. eyelid.] In zool., a valvular external cutaneous ear which can be shut down upon the auditory opening.

The tympanic membrane [of the crocodile] is exposed, but a cutaneous valve or earlid, lies above each and can be shut down over it.
Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 213.

ear-lifter (er'lift'er), n. [ME. erl, erl, + lifter.] A projecting guide on the knife-bar of a harvester to assist in lifting fallen or storm-beaten grain, so that it can be cut by the machine.

earliness (er'lin'nes), n. The state or fact of being early; a state of advance or forwardness; a state of being prior to something else, or at the beginning.

The goodness of the crop is great gain, if the goodness answers the earliness of sowing up.
Bacon.

Thy earliness doth me assure,
Thou art up-rous'd by some distemp'rance.
Shak., R. and J., II. 2.

I have prayed your son Halbert that we may strive to-morrow with the sun's earliness to wake a stag from his lair.

2. Possessing or characterized by seriousness in seeking, doing, etc.; strongly bent; intent: as, an earnest disposition.

On that prospect strange
Their earnest eyes they fix'd. Milton, P. L., x. 653.

3. Strivous; diligent: as, earnest efforts.—4. Serious; weighty: of a serious, important, or weighty nature; not trifling or feigned.

They whom earnest lets do often hinder. Hooker, Eccles. Polity.

Your knocks were so earnest that the very sound of them made me start. Romney, Pilgrim's Progress, p. 244.

Life is real, life is earnest. Longfellow, Psalm of Life.

earnest (ēr'nest), v. t. [= G. ernsten, to severe, speak or act severely; from the noun.] To be serious with; use in earnest.

Let's prove among ourselves our earnest in jest,
That when we come to earnest them with men,
We may them better use. Pastor Pido (1699), etc., E. 1.

earnest (ēr'nest), n. [*With excrement -t, < ME. ernas, ernas, a pledge, < W. ernas, a pledge, ern, a pledge, ernas, give a pledge. Cf. L. arras, arra, earnest: see arras and arrha.] 1. A portion of something given or done in advance as a pledge; security in kind; specifically, in law, a part of the price of goods or services bargained for, which is paid at the time of the bargain to evidence the fact that the negotiation has ended in an actual contract. Hence it is said to bind the bargain. Sometimes the earnest, if trifling in amount, is not taken into account in the reckoning.*

Giving them some money in hand as an earnest of the rest. Ludlow, Memoirs.

2. Anything that gives pledge, promise, assurance, or indication of what is to follow; first-fruits.

Poul tellth in this epistle of freedom of Cristene men, how thei have ther ernes here, and fully freedom in hevene.
Wyclif, Select Works (ed. Arnold), II. 277.

He who from such a kind of Psalmist, or any other verbal devotion, without the pledge and earnest of suitable deeds, can be persuaded of a zeale and true righteousness in the person, hath much yet to learn. Milton, Eikonoklastes, I.

Ev'ry moment's calm that soothes the breast
Is giv'n in earnest of eternal rest. Cowper, An Epistle.

=Syn. Earnest, Pledge. Earnest, like pledge, is security given for the doing of something definite in the future, and generally returned when the conditions of the contract have been fulfilled. In 2 Cor. I. 22 and v. 5 we read that the Spirit is given as the earnest of indefinite future favors from God; in Blackstone we find "a penny, or any portion of the goods delivered as earnest." Whether literal or figurative, earnest is always a pledge in kind, a part paid or given in warrant that more of the same kind is forthcoming; as in "Macbeth," I. 3, Macbeth is hailed thane of Cawdor "for an earnest of a greater honor." See also "Cymbeline," I. 6. Pledge is often used figuratively for that which secures promise or indicated by the actions of the present, earnest being preferred for that which is of the same nature with the thing promised, and pledge for that which is materially different.

Man, if not yet fully installed in his powers, has given much earnest of his claims. Mary, Fuller, Woman in 19th Cent., p. 15.

Seldom has so much promise, seldom have so great earnests of great work, been so sadly or so fatally blighted. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 10.

Bright pledge of peace and sunshine.
Vaughan, The Rainsbow.

earnest (ēr'nest), v. t. [< earnest, n.] To serve as an earnest or a pledge of.

This little we see is something in hand, to earnest to us those things which are in hope.

T. Shepard, Clear Sunshine of the Gospel, Ded.

earnestful (ēr'nest-fūl), a. [< earnest + -ful.] Serious; earnest.

Let us stint of earnestful matters. Chaucer, Clerk's Tale, I. 1176.

earnestly (ēr'nest-lī), adv. [< ME. earnestly, < AS. cornostliker, earnestly, strictly (also used conjunctively as a stiff translation of L. ergo, igitur, itaque, etc., therefore, and so, but, etc.) (= D. ernstelij = OHG. ernstlihho, MHG. ernstliche, G. ernstlich), < cornost, earnest, + -lic, E. -ly.] In an earnest manner; warmly; zealously; importunately; eagerly; with real desire; with fixed attention.

Thenne enlez on erthe earnestly growen. Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), I. 2227.

Being in an agony, he prayed more earnestly. Luke xlii. 44.

There stood the king, and long time earnestly Looked on the lessening ship. William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 302.

earnest-money (ēr'nest-mun'ī), n. Money paid as earnest to bind a bargain or ratify and confirm a sale. Also called hand-money.

earnestness (ēr'nest-nēs), n. 1. Intensity or zeal in the pursuit of anything; eagerness; strong or eager desire; energetic striving: as, to seek or ask with earnestness; to engage in a work with earnestness.

So false is the heart of man, so . . . contradictory are its actions and intentions, that some men pursue virtue with great earnestness, and yet cannot with patience look upon it in another. J. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 709.

Moderation costs nothing to a man who has no earnestness. H. N. Oakesham, Short Studies, p. 160.

They who have no religious earnestness are at the mercy, day by day, of some new argument or fact, which may overtake them, in favor of one conclusion or the other. J. H. Newman, Gram. of Assent, p. 414.

2. Anxious care; solicitude; strength of feeling; seriousness: as, a man of great earnestness; the charge was maintained with much earnestness.

I learn that there is truth and firmness and earnestness of doing good alive in the world. Danby, Letters, xlvii.

=Syn. 1. Zeal, Enthusiasm, etc. See earnest.

earnest-penny (ēr'nest-pen'ī), n. Same as earnest-money.

Accept this gift, most rare, most fine, most new;
The earnest-penny of a love so fervent.

Ford, Love's Sacrifice, II. 2.

An argument of greater good hereafter, and an earnest-penny of the perfection of the present grace, that is, of the rewards of glory. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 266.

ear-net (ēr'net), n. A covering for the ears of horses, made of netted cord, to keep out flies.

earnful (ēr'nful), a. [A var. of yearnful.] Full of anxiety; causing anxiety or yearning.

The earnest smart which eats my breast.

F. Fletcher, Piscatory Eclogues, v.

earning (ēr'ning), n. [ME. earning, ernung, < AS. earnung, earning (= OHG. arnunc, arnunga), desert, reward, verbal n. of earnian, earn: see earnal.] That which is earned; that which is gained or merited by labor, service, or performance; reward; wages; compensation: used chiefly in the plural.

This is the great expense of the poor that takes up almost all their earnings. Locke.

A tax on that part of profits known as earnings of management. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 88.

earning (ēr'ning), n. [Verbal n. of earn, v.] Bonnet. Brockett. [Prov. Eng.]

earning-grass (ēr'ning-grās), n. The common butterwort, Pinguicula vulgaris: so called from its property of curdling milk. [Prov. Eng.]

ear-pick (ēr'pik), n. An instrument for cleaning the ear.

ear-piece (ēr'pēs), n. [Tr. of F. oreillère.] A name given to the side-piece of the burgonet or open helmet of the sixteenth century, usually made of splints, and covering a leather strap or chip-band to which they are riveted. Compare check-piece. Also called oreillère.

ear-piercer (ēr'pēr'sēr), n. [Tr. of F. perce-oreille.] The carwig.

ear-piercing (ēr'pēr'sing), a. Piercing the ear, as a shrill or sharp sound.

O, farewell!

Farewell the neighing steed, and the shrill trump,

The spirit-stirring drum, the ear-piercing fife.

Shak., Othello, III. 3.

ear-pocket (ēr'pok'et), n. The little pouch formed by a fold of skin at the root of the outer ear of some animals, as the cat.

ear-reach (ēr'rēch), n. Hearing-distance; ear-shot. [Rare.]

The sound of it might have pierced your senses with gladness, had you been in ear-reach of it.

B. Jonson, Epicure, II. 2.

Some invisible care might be in ambush within the ear-reach of his words. Fuller, Holy State.

ear-rent (ēr'rent), n. Payment made by laceration or loss of the ears.

A hole to thrust your heads in, ear-ring (ēr'ring), n. [ME. erring, erryng, < AS. earhring (= D. oorruy = OHG. orring, MHG. orring, G. orring = Sw. orring = Dan. orring), < ear, + ring, ring: see earl and ring.] A ring or other ornament, usually of gold or silver, and with or without precious stones, worn at the ear, the usual means of attachment being the ring itself, or a hook or projection which forms a part of it, passing through the lobe. Among Orientals ear-rings have been used by both sexes from the earliest times. In England they were worn by the Romanized Britons and by Anglo-Saxons. After the tenth century the fashion seems to have declined throughout Europe, and ear-rings are neither found in graves nor seen in paintings or sculptures. The wearing of ear-rings was reintroduced into England in the sixteenth century, and Stubbs, writing in the time of Queen Elizabeth, says, "The women are not ashamed to make holes in their ears wherewith they hang rings and other jewels of gold and precious stones." The use of ear-rings by women has continued to the present time. In the seventeenth century they were worn by men; and seafaring men, especially of the southern nations of Europe, have retained the use of them, commonly in the form of gold hoops, down to our own times. Among women the shape of ear-rings changes completely with the fashions, long, heavy pendants being succeeded by smaller ones, and these by single stones in almost invisible clasps, set close to the lobe of the ear.

For which you should pay ear-rent. E. Jonson.

Without earrings of silver or some other metal . . . you shall see no Roman woman, be she wife or maid.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 157.

ear-rivet (ēr'riv'et), n. One of the otopyrion of a hydrozoan. See otopyrion.

Ears, n. See Erce.

earsh, erash (ēr'ash), n. [E. dial., also errish, erige, arish, and by contraction ash, < ME. asche, stubble, appar. corrupted, by association with asche, asbes, from reg. erach*, *< AS. *erac, erac, found only in comp. erac-hen, erac-hen, equiv. to edde-aga, a quail (see edde-hen), ediac, and presumably erac, erac, meaning a pasture, a park for game: see eddish. The ult. origin and the relations of the two words are not clear.] Stubble; a stubble-field: same as eddish, 1.

ear-shell (ēr'shel), n. The common name of any shell of the family Halutidae; a sea-ear: so called from the shape. Guernsey ear-shell, Halutia tuberculata, same as errier.

ear-shot (ēr'shot), n. Reach of hearing; the distance at which words may be heard.

Gomez, stand you out of ear shot. I have something to say to your wife in private. Dequien, Spanish Friar.

There were numerous heavy oaken benches, which, by the united efforts of several men, might be brought within earshot of the pulpit. Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, vi.

ear-shrift (ēr'shrift), n. Auricular confession. The Papists' Lenten preparation of forty days' earshrift. Cartwright, Admonition.

Your earshrift (one part of your penance) is to no purpose. Calhill, Answer to Martull, p. 245.

ear-snail (ēr'snāl), n. A snail of the family Utinidae.

ear-sore (ēr'sōr), a. and n. I. a. Morose; quarrelsome; apt to take offense.

II. n. Something that offends the ear. The perpetual jangling of the chimies too in all the great towns of Flanders is no small ear sore to us. Tom Brown, Works, I. 206.

earst, adv. An archaic spelling of erst.

ear-stone (ēr'ston), n. An otolith. The substance of these concretions is often called brain ivory (which see, under ivory).

ear-string (ēr'string), n. An ornamental appendage worn by men in the seventeenth century; a silk cord, usually black, passed through the lobe of the ear and hanging in two, four, or more strands, sometimes so low as to lie upon the shoulder, sometimes only two or three inches long. In all the representations of this fashion it is limited to the left ear.

earth (ērth), n. [Early mod. E. also erth; < ME. erthe, corthe, < AS. eorthe = OS. ertha, ertha = OFrick. erthe, erthe, erthe, erthe, erthe, erthe = MD. erde, aerde, D. aerde = MLG. erde = OHG. erda, erdho, MHG. G. erde = Lecl. jorff, Sw. jord = Dan. jord = Goth. artha, earth (O'Leut. ertha*, in L. as Hitha, as the name of a goddess); allied to OHG. era, earth, Lecl. jorff, grave, Gr. tpa-er, to the earth, on the ground. Usually, but without much probability, referred to the $\sqrt{}$ ar, plow, whence erth, earth, erth, arable, etc.] 1. The terreneous globe which we inhabit. It is one of the planets of the solar system, being the third in order from the sun. The figure of the earth is approximately that of a spheroid of revolution or oblate spheroid, the axes of which measure 19,751,700 meters and 19,713,042 meters, or 7,920 statute miles and 7,641 yards, and 7,820 statute miles and 7,641 yards, respectively, thus making the compression 1/293. The radius of the earth, considered as a sphere, is 3,959 miles. The mean density of the whole earth is 5.5, or about twice that of the crust, and its interior is probably metallic. The earth revolves upon its axis in one sidereal day, which is 23 minutes and 55.91 seconds shorter than a mean solar day. Its axis remains nearly parallel to itself, but has a large but slow variation which produces the precession of the equinoxes. The whole earth revolves about the sun in an ellipse in one sidereal year, which is 365 days, 5 hours, 9 minutes, and 9 seconds. The elliptic orbit of the earth's orbit, is inclined to the equator by 23° 27' 17". Its mean obliquity for January 9, 1860, according to Hansen. The earth is distant from the sun by about 93,000,000 miles.

A noble tree, then, ascomen, I believe him that the on the earth brought. York Plays, p. 214.

One expression only in the Old Testament gives us the word earth in its astronomical meaning, - that in the twenty sixth chapter of Job -

"He stretched out the north over empty space;
He hanged the earth upon nothing."

Darwin, Nature and the Bible, p. 104.

It appears . . . from what we know of the tides of the ocean, that the earth as a whole is more rigid than glass, and therefore that no very large portion of its interior can be liquid. Clark Maxwell, Heat, p. 21.

What are these
So withered, and so wild in their attire,
That look not like the inhabitants of the earth,
And yet are on it? Shak., Macbeth, I. iii. 30.

2. The solid matter of the globe, in distinction from water and air; the materials composing the solid parts of the globe; hence, the firm land of the earth's surface; the ground: as, he fell to the earth.

God called the dry land earth. Gen. I. 10.

3. The loose material of the earth's surface; the disintegrated particles of solid matter, in distinction from rock; more particularly, the combinations of particles constituting soil, mold, or dust, as opposed to unmixed sand or clay. Earth, being regarded by ancient philosophers as simple, was called an element; and in popular language we still hear of the four elements, fire, air, earth, and water.

Withlone a litl tyme go wehal as al the gidd withlone the Mercurie turned into erthe as sotile as flour.

Book of Quinte Essence (ed. Furnivall), p. 8.

Two mules' burden of earth. 2 Ki. v. 17.

The majority of the cities and towns [of Greece] complied with the demand made upon them, and gave the [Persian] king earth and water.

Von Hantke, Univ. Hist. (trans.), p. 163.

4. The inhabitants of the globe; the world.

The whole earth was of one language. Gen. xi. 1.

She is the hopeful lady of my earth. Shak., R. and J., I. 2.

5. Dirt; hence, something low or mean.

What ho! slave! Caliban!

Thou earth, thou! speak. Shak., Tempest, I. 2.

6. The hole in which a fox or other burrowing animal hides itself.

Seeing I never stray'd beyond the cell,
But live like an old badger in his earth.

Tennyson, Holy Grail.

7. In chem., a name formerly given to certain inodorous, dry, and unflammable substances which are metallic oxides, but were formerly regarded as elementary bodies. They are insoluble in water, difficultly fusible, and not easily reduced to the metallic state. The most important of them are alumina, zirconia, glucina, yttria, and thorina. The alkaline earths, baryta, strontia, lime, and magnesia, have upon the properties of the alkalis, being somewhat soluble in water, and having an alkaline taste and reaction.

8. In elect.: (a) The union of any point of a telegraph-line, submarine cable, or any system of conductors charged with or conveying electricity with the ground. It is generally made by joining the point at which the earth is to be established by means of a good conductor with a metallic plate buried in moist earth, or with metallic water-pipes or gas-pipes, which, on account of their large surface of contact with the earth, usually afford excellent earth-connections. (b) A fault in a telegraph-line or cable, arising out of an accidental contact of some part of the metallic circuit with the earth or with more or less perfect conductors connected with the earth. - Adamic earth. See Adamic. - Axis of the earth. See axis. - Bad earth, in elect., a connection with the earth in which great resistance is offered to the passage of the current. - Black earth, a kind of soil which is powdered fine and used by painters in fresco. - Chian earth. See Chian. - Cologne earth, a kind of light bastard ochre, of a deep-brown color, transparent, and durable in water-color painting. It is an earthy variety of lignite or partially fossilized wood, and occurs in an irregular bed from 20 to 50 feet deep near Cologne, whence the name. - Compression of the earth. See compression. - Dead earth, or total earth, in elect., an earth-connection offering almost no resistance to the passage of the current, as when a telegraph wire falls upon a railroad track, or when the conductor of a submarine cable has a considerable surface in actual contact with the water. - Earth of alum, a substance obtained by precipitating the earth from alum dissolved in water by adding ammonia or potassa. It is used for paints. - Earth of bone, a phosphated lime existing in bones after calcination. - Ends of the earth. See end. - Figure of the earth, the shape and size, not of the earth's surface, but of the mean sea level continued under the land at the heights at which water would stand in canals open to the sea; also, the generalized figure or ellipsoid which most nearly coincides with the figure of the sea-level.

If Lactantius affirm that the figure of the earth is plane, or Austin deny there are antipodes, though venerable fathers of the church and ever to be honoured, yet will not their authorities prove sufficient to ground a belief thereon.

Sir T. Brown, Vulg. Err., I. 7.

Good earth, in elect., a connection with the earth in which the current meets with little resistance in its passage from the wire or conductor to the earth. - Heavy earth. Same as baryta. - Intermittent earth, in elect., an earth-connection such as is produced by a wire touching at intervals conducting bodies in connection with the earth. - Magnetic poles of the earth. See magnetic. - Partial earth, in elect., a poor earth connection, such as exists when a telegraph wire rests upon the ground, when its insulation is defective, or when it touches any conductor connected with the earth, but offering considerable resistance. - To bring to the earth, to bury. Eng. Gild. - To put to earth, in elect., to join or connect a conductor with the earth. - To run to earth, in hunting, to chase the game, as a fox, to its hole or burrow. - Syn. 1. Earth, World, Globe. Earth is used as the distinctive name of our planet in the solar system, as Mercury, Venus, Earth, Mars, etc. It is used not only of soil, but of the planet regarded as material, and also as the name of the human race. (See Job I. 7; Ps. lxxxviii. 11.) World has especial application to the earth as inhabited; hence we say, he is gone to a better world; are there other worlds besides this? It belongs, therefore, especially to the surface of the earth; hence we speak of sailing around the world, but not the earth. Globe makes prominent the roundness of the earth; as, to circumnavigate the globe.

The first man is of the earth, earthy. 1 Cor. xv. 47.

The Sun flies forward to his brother Sun;

The dark Earth follows wheel'd in her ellipse.

Tennyson, Golden Year.

Poets, whose thoughts enrich the blood of the world.

Tennyson, Princess, II.

In the four quarters of the globe, who reads an American book?

Sydney Smith, Rev. of Bayly's Annals of United States

Oh, the head of Frederick is all the blood which was shed in a war which raged during many years and in every quarter of the globe.

Magulay, Frederic the Great.

And an eternity, the date of gods,
Depended on poor earth-created man!
Young, Night Thoughts, ix. 220.

earth-inductor (arth'in-duk'tor), n. In elect., a coil of wire arranged so as to be capable of earth-plate (erth'plāt), n. In elect., a metallic plate buried in the ground, forming the earth-connection of a telegraph-wire, lightning-conductor, or other electrical appliances.

earthquake (érth'puf), n. A species of Lycopodium; the puffball.

Tubera, mushrooms, chalcidites, earth-puffs.

earth-pulsation (érth'pul-sá'shen), n. A slow wave-like movement of the surface of the earth. Such movements, in general, escape attention on account of their long period.

earthquake (érth'kwák), n. [ME. erthequake, < erthe, earth, + quake, quake. The AS. words were eorþ-bifung, -beofung (bifung, trembling), eorþ-dyne (dyne, din), eorþ-styrung (styrung, stirring), eorþstýrennis. Cf. earth-din.] A movement or vibration of a part of the earth's crust. Such movements are of every degree of violence, from those that are scarcely perceptible without the aid of apparatus specially contrived for the purpose to those which overthrow buildings, rend the ground asunder, and destroy thousands of human lives. The duration of earthquakes is as variable as their intensity. Sometimes there is a single shock, lasting only a second or two; at other times a great number of shocks occur in succession, separated by greater or less intervals of time, the earth not being reduced to complete quiescence for weeks or even months. It is not known that any portion of the earth's surface is entirely exempt from earthquakes; but there are large areas where no very destructive ones have ever occurred, either in the memory of man or as recorded in history. The regions most frequently visited by destructive shocks are those where active volcanoes exist, those near high mountain ranges, and those where the rocks are of recent geological age, and are much disturbed or uplifted. Such regions are the vicinity of the Mediterranean, the shores of the Pacific and the adjacent islands, the neighborhood of the Alps, and the East India islands. Regions not liable to seismic disturbances are the whole of northeastern North America, the east side of South America, the north of Asia, and a large part of Africa. An earthquake shock is a wave like motion of a part of the earth's crust, and, in the words of Humboldt, is one of the ways in which the reaction of the interior of the earth against its exterior makes itself manifest. The most destructive earthquake of which we have any knowledge was that of Lisbon. It began November 1st, 1755, and was felt over that part of the earth's surface included between Ireland on the north, Morocco in Morocco on the south, Toplice in Bohemia on the east, and the West India islands on the west. The destruction of life and property occasioned by this shock was very great. The disturbance continued, especially in the vicinity of the Mediterranean, with short intermissions, for several months. On November 18th, 1755, the most violent shock occurred which has been felt in New England since its settlement by the whites. One of the most destructive earthquakes of recent occurrence was that which took place on the island of Ischia near Naples, July 26th, 1883, by which over 2,000 persons perished. By the earthquake at Mendoza, South America, on the 20th of March, 1881, over 12,000 persons lost their lives. A violent earthquake, most destructive in Charleston, South Carolina, and vicinity, occurred on the night of August 31st, 1886. See seismic, seismometer, and volcanism.

When the Jews hadden made the Temple, com an Erthe quake, and eat it down (as God wold) and destroyed all that thei had made.

And all the yle ys sor trobled with the seyde Erthe quake Dyve tymes. Tynkington, Diary of Eng. Travell, p. 18.

It was calculated . . . by Sir C. Lyell that an earthquake which occurred in Chili in 1822 added to the South American continent a mass of rock more than equal in weight to a hundred thousand of the great pyramids of Egypt. Huxley, Physiography, p. 187.

Earthquake-shadow, that part of the earth's surface which is in some degree protected from an advancing earthquake-wave by the interposition of a mountain range, hill, ravine, or other arrangement of the geological formation which offers an obstacle to its passage.

earth-shine (érth'shin), n. [< earth + shine. Cf. moonshine, sunshine, starshine.] In astron., the faint light visible on the part of the moon not illuminated by the sun. It is due to the light which the earth reflects on the moon, and is most conspicuous soon after new moon, when the sun-illuminated part of the disk is smallest. This phenomenon is popularly described as "the old moon in the new moon's arms."

earth-smoke (érth'smók), n. [A translation of L. fumus terre: fumus, smoke; terra, gen. of terra, earth: see fumitory and terrestrial.] The plant fumitory, Fumaria officinalis.

earth-star (érth'stär), n. [A translation of Geaster.] A fungus of the genus Geaster: a kind of puffball having a double peridium, the outer layer of which breaks into segments which become reflexed, forming a star-like structure about the base of the fungus.

earth-stopper (érth'stop'ér), n. In hunting, one who stops up the earths of foxes to prevent their escape.

The earth-stopper is an important functionary in countries where there are many earths. Encyc. Brit., XII. 206.

earth-table (érth'tá'bl), n. In arch., a projecting course or plinth resting immediately upon the foundations. Also called grass-table and ground-table. See ledgment-table.

earth-tilting (érth'til'ting), n. A slight movement or displacement of the surface of the ground in some forms of earthquake.

Earth-tiltings show themselves by a slow bending and subending of the surface, so that a post stuck in the ground, vertical to begin with, does not remain vertical, but inclines now to one side and now to another, the plane of the ground in which it stands shifting relatively to the horizon. Encyc. Brit., XXI. 620.

earth-tongue (érth'tung), n. The popular name given to club-shaped fungi of the genus Geoglossum, found in lawns and grassy pastures.

earth-treatment (érth'trót'ment), n. A method of treating wounds with clay (or clayey earth) dried and finely powdered. It is applied to the wound as a desodorizing agent, tending at the same time to prevent or arrest putrefaction. Thomas, Med. Dict.

earth-tremor (érth'tróm'ór), n. A minute movement of the surface of the earth, resembling an earthquake in rapidity of oscillation, but on account of its small amplitude requiring instrumental means for its detection.

earthward, earthwards (érth'wárd, -wárdz), adv. [< earth + -ward, -wards.] Toward the earth.

earth-wire (érth'wír), n. In elect., a wire used for joining conductors with the earth: especially applied to wires placed upon telegraph-poles for the purpose of conveying the leakage from the line to the earth, thus preventing interference by leakage from one line to another.

earthwolf (érth'wulf), n. The aardwolf. See Proteles.

earthwork (érth'wérk), n. [*< ME. erthwerk, < AS. earthweorc (= D. aurdwerk = G. erdwerk = Dan. jordværk), < erthe, earth, + weorc, work: see earth + work.] 1. In engin., any operation in which earth is removed or thrown up, as in cuttings, embankments, etc.—2. In fort., any offensive or defensive construction formed chiefly of earth: commonly in the plural. Hence—3. Any similar construction, as the ancient mounds of earth found in various parts of the United States, of unknown use and origin. They differ widely in form, but are always well defined in plan, and sometimes enclose large areas.

Anyhow, there the mound is, an earthwork which, if artificial it be, the Lady of the Medians herself need not have been ashamed of. E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 30.

earthworm (érth'wérn), n. [= D. aurdworm = G. erdwurm; < earth + worm.] 1. The common name of the worms of the family Lumbricidae (which see), and especially of the genus Lumbricus, of which there are several species, one of the best-known being L. terrestris. They belong to the order of oligochaeta, is annelids. The earthworm has a cylindrical vermiform body, tapering at both ends, segmented into a great number of rings, destitute of legs, eyes, or any appendages visible on ordinary inspection. It moves by the contraction of the successive segments of the body, aided by rows of bristles which are capable of being retracted. It is hermaphrodite, each individual of a pair impregnating the other in copulation when the two are joined in two places by their respective ocella. Earthworms are highly useful, giving a kind of tillage to the land, loosening the soil and rendering it more permeable to the air. According to Darwin, in his work on "The Formation of Vegetable Mould," etc., earthworms, from their enormous numbers, exercise a highly important agency not only in this respect, but in the creation and aggregation of new soil, the burial and preservation (as also the original disintegration) of organic remains of all kinds, etc. They are food for many birds, mammals, and other animals, and their value for bait is well known to the angler, whence they are often called angleworms or fishworms. These worms are mostly a few inches long, but there are species attaining a length of a yard or more.

The people who inhabit the highlands of Southern Brazil have a firm belief in the existence of a gigantic earthworm fifty yards or more in length, five to six feet in breadth, covered with bones as with a coat of mail, and of such strength as to be able to uproot great pine trees as though they were blades of grass, and to throw up such quantities of clay in making its way underground as to dam up streams and divert them into new courses. This fabulous monster is known as the "Minhocão."

ebb (eb), v. [< ME. ebben, < AS. ebbian = D. ebben = MIG. LG. ebben (> MHG. eppen, G. ebben) = Sw. ebba = Dan. ebbe, ebb; see the noun.] I. intrans. 1. To flow back; return, as the water of a tide, toward the ocean; subside; opposed to flow; as, the tide ebbs and flows twice in twenty-four hours. See tide.

This Watre renneeth, flowynge and ebbynge, be sayde of the Mountayne.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 100.

But that which I did most admire was, to see the Water keep ebbing for two days together, without any flood, till the creek where we lived was almost dry.
Dampier, Voyages, II. III. 60.

2. To return or recede; fall away; decline.

Now, when all is wither'd, shrunk, and dry'd,
All virtues ebbd out to a dead low tide.
Donne, Countess of Salisbury.

I lay
And felt them slowly ebbing, name and fame.
Tennyson, Merlin and Vivien.

3. Syn. To recede, retire, decrease, sink, lower, wane, fall away.

II. trans. To cause to subside. [Rare.]

That disdainful look has pierc'd my soul, and ebbd my rage to penitence and sorrow.
Shak., Lying Lover, II. 1.

ebb-anchor (eb'ang'kor), n. The anchor by which a ship rides during the ebb-tide.

ebb-tide (eb'tid), n. The reflux of tide-water; the retiring tide.

ebent, n. An obsolete form of ebon. Johnson.

Ebenaceæ (eb-â-nâ-sé-â), n. pl. [NL., < L. ebenus (see ebony) + -aceæ.] A natural order of gamopetalous exogens, containing 5 or 6 genera and about 250 species, shrubs or trees, chiefly inhabiting the tropics, with hard and heavy wood. Among the valuable timbers yielded by this order are the ebony, calamander-wood, marbled-wood, etc. The largest and most important genus is Diospyros. See cut under Diospyros.

ebenet, n. An obsolete form of ebon.

ebeneous (eb-â-nâ-us), a. [< L. ebeneus, of ebony, < L. ebenus, ebony; see ebony.] Of or pertaining to ebony; black; ebony-colored.

Ebenezer (eb-en-â-zér), n. [Heb., 'the stone of help.'] A stone erected by Samuel (1 Sam. vii. 12) as a memorial of divine aid in defeating the Philistines; hence, any memorial of divine assistance.

Ebionism (é-bi-on-izm), n. Same as Ebionitism. Ebionite (é-bi-on-ít), n. and a. [< LL. Ebionista, pl., lit. 'Ebraizans,' < Heb. ebionim (pl. of ebion), Gr. 'the poor'; the origin of the application of the name is uncertain.] I. n.

A member of a party of Judaizing Christians which appeared in the church as early as the second century and disappeared about the fourth century. They agreed in (1) the recognition of Jesus as the Messiah, (2) the denial of his divinity, (3) belief in the universal obligation of the Mosaic law, and (4) rejection of Paul and his writings. The two great divisions of Ebionites were the Pharisaic Ebionites, who emphasized the obligation of the Mosaic law, and the Essenic Ebionites, who were more speculative and leaned toward Gnosticism.

II. a. Relating to the heresy of the Ebionites. Ebionitic (é-bi-on-ít-ik), a. [< Ebionite + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Ebionites or Ebionitism. Ebionitism (é-bi-on-ít-izm), n. [< Ebionite + -ism.] The doctrines or system of the Ebionites. Also Ebionism.

The principal monument of the Essenic Ebionitism is the pseudo-Clementine writings, whose date is somewhere in the latter part of the second century.

G. P. Fisher, Begin. of Christianity, p. 608.

Ebol, n. [Heb. ebol, the hall of demons; pandemonium.] ebol-light (é-bô-lit), n. [< ebol, appar. W. Ind., + light.] The Erythroxylon brevipes, a shrub of the West Indies.

ebol-torchwood (é-bô-tôreh'wud), n. Same as ebol-light.

ebol-tree (é-bô-tré), n. A leguminous tree, Dipteryx oleifera, of the Mosquito Coast in Central America, the seeds of which yield a large quantity of oil. They resemble the tonquin-bean, but are entirely without fragrance.

ebon (eb'on), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also eben, heben, ebene, etc. (cf. D. ebbenholtz = G. ebenholtz (> Dan. ibenholt = Sw. ebenholtz, 'ebony-wood'), < OF. ebonus, ebene, F. ebene = FL. ebena = Sp. Pg. It. ebano, < L. ebenus, corruptly hebenus, < Gr. ἑβένος, ἑβένω, the ebony-tree, ebony, prob. of Phen. origin; cf. Heb. habinin, pl., ebony; so called in allusion to its hardness; < eben, a stone. Now usually ebony, ebon being chiefly poetical; see ebony.] I. n. Ebony (which see).

To write those plagues that then were coming on Both ask a pen of ebon and the night.
Drayton, Barons' Wars, iv.

Of all those trees that be appropriate to India, Virgil hath highly commended the ebon above the rest.
Holland, tr. of Pliny, xii. 4.

II. a. 1. Consisting or made of ebony.

A gentle youth, his dearly loved Aquilo,
His spears of ebon wood behind him bare.
Spenser, F. Q., I. vii. 27.

2. Like ebony in color; dark; black.

Heaven's ebon vault,
Studded with stars unutterably bright,
Through which the moon's unclouded grandeur rolls.
Shelley, Queen Mab, iv.

Sappho, with that gloriolous
Of ebon hair on calmed brow.
Mrs. Browning, Vision of Poets.

ebonist (eb'on-ist), n. [< ebon, ebony, + -ist.] A worker in ebony.

ebonite (eb'on-ít), n. [< ebon, ebony, + -ite.] 1. A black, hardened compound of caoutchouc or gutta-percha and sulphur in different proportions, to which other ingredients may be added for specific uses; properly, black vulcanite, but used also as a general synonym of vulcanite (which see).

ebonize (eb'on-íz), v. t.; pret. and pp. ebonized, ppr. ebonizing. [< ebon, ebony, + -ize.] 1. To stain black, as wood, with a view to the imitation of natural ebony; as, a bookcase of ebonized wood.—2. To make black or tawny; tinge with the color of ebony; as, to ebonize the fairest complexion.

Also spelled ebonise.

ebony (eb'on-i), n. and a. [Early mod. E. ebonis, ibonis; an extended form of ebon, q. v.] I. n.; pl. ebonies (-iz). A name given to various woods distinguished in general by their dark color and hardness, and extensively used for carving, ornamental cabinet-work, instruments, canes, etc. The most valuable is the heart-wood of Diospyros ebenum, which grows in great abundance in the flat parts of Ceylon, and is of such size that logs of its heart-wood 3 feet in diameter and from 10 to 15 feet long are easily procured. Other varieties of valuable ebony are obtained from D. ebenaster of the East Indies and D. melanocarpa of the Comorand coast in Hindustan. The most usual color is black, but the ebones from tropical America vary much in this respect. The green ebony of Jamaica, known also as American or West Indian ebony, the wood of a leguminous tree, Brya ebenus, takes a beautiful polish, and is used for inlaying, making staves, etc. The brown ebony of British Guiana, the source of which is uncertain, is dark-brown, often with

5. An eccentric action or characteristic; a striking peculiarity of character or conduct.

was (Frederic William's) eccentricities were such as had never before been seen out of a mad-house.

Miscellany, Frederic the Great.

Also eccentricity in the literal uses.

Angle of eccentricity, in geom., the angle whose sine is equal to the eccentricity of an ellipse. — Bisection of the eccentricity. See bisection. — Temporal eccentricity, in astr., the eccentricity of the orbit of Mercury at any time. Since the eccentricity of Mercury was supposed itself to be carried on an eccentric, it follows that the eccentricity would not be a constant quantity.

eccentric-rod (ek-sen'trik-rod), n. In mech., the main connecting-link by which the motion of an eccentric is transmitted.

eccentric-strap (ek-sen'trik-strap), n. In mech., the band of iron which embraces the circumference of an eccentric, and within which it revolves. The eccentric-rod is attached to it. Also called eccentric-keop.

eccentrometer (ek-sen'tron'o-tér), n. [L. eccentros, eccentric, + metrum, measure.] Any instrument used to determine the eccentricity of a projectile.

encephalosis (ek-sen'falo'sis), n. [N.L., < Gr. en, out of, + kephalé, head: see cephalic and -osis.] In obstet., an operation in which the brain of the child is removed to facilitate delivery; excerebration.

enope signum (ek'se sig'nun), [L., behold, the sign; enope, behold (see enope homo); signum, sign; see sign.] Behold, the sign; here is the proof.

echondroma (ek-on-dro'ma), n.; pl. echondromata (-ma-ta). [N.L., < Gr. ek, out of, + chondros, cartilage, + -oma.] A chondroma or cartilaginous tumor growing from the surface of a bone; a chondroma originating in normal cartilage, and forming an outgrowth from it.

echondrosis (ek-on-dro'sis), n. [N.L., < Gr. ek, out of, + chondros, cartilage (cf. ekchondros, make into cartilage), + -osis.] Same as echondroma. Also ekchondrosis.

echymoma (ek-i-mo'ma), n.; pl. echymomata (-ma-ta). [N.L., < Gr. ek, out of, + chymos, juice, + -oma.] A swelling on the skin caused by extravasation of blood.

echymosed (ek'i-most), a. [< echymos + -ed.] Characterized by or partaking of the nature of echymosis.

The changes which take place in the colour of an echymosed spot are worthy of attention, since they may serve to aid the witness in giving an opinion on the probable time at which a contusion has been inflicted.

A. S. Taylor, Med. Jurisprudence, p. 192.

echymosis (ek-i-mo'sis), n.; pl. echymoses (-ses). [= F. echymose, < N.L. echymosis, < Gr. ekchymos, < ekchymosai, shed the blood and leave it extravasated under the skin, < ek, out, + chymos, juice, animal juice, < chymos, pour: see chymol.] In med., a livid, black, or yellow spot produced by extravasated blood. In dermatology the word usually denotes an extravasation of greater extent than the small spots called petechie.

M. Tardieu states that he has seen these subpleural echymoses in the body of an infant ten months after death.

A. S. Taylor, Med. Jurisprudence, p. 399.

echymotic (ek-i-mot'ik), a. [= F. echymotique; as echymosis (-mot-) + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of echymosis; as, echymotic collections.

In purpura hemorrhagica the lesions are usually more numerous, more extensive, echymotic in character.

Ecol. An abbreviation (a) of Ecclesiastes; (b) [L. o.] of ecclesiastical.

ecclia, n. See ecclesi.

Ecclia. An abbreviation (a) of Ecclesiastes; (b) [L. o.] of ecclesiastical.

ecclesia (e-kle'si-ä), n.; pl. ecclesie, ecclesias (-ä, -äs). [= F. église = Fr. gliza, glicza, glizia = Sp. iglesia = Pg. igreja = It. chiesa (also ecclesia), church, < L. ecclesia, an assembly of the (Greek) people, L. (also, as in ML., sometimes eclesia) a church, congregation of Christians, = Ar. kelise, kense = Turk. kelise = Pers. kalis, kunisa, a church, < Gr. ekklesia, an assembly of the people, L. ekklesia, an assembly of Christians, a church, < ekkaleo, summoned, < ekaleo, summon, call out, < ek, out, + kaléo, call: see calend.] 1. An assembly; the great assembly of the people in certain ancient Greek states, as Athens, at which every free citizen had a right to vote.

The people in the United States, . . . planted, as they are, over large dominions, cannot meet in one assembly, and therefore are not exposed to those tumultuous convulsions, like the raging waves of the sea, which always agitated the ecclesia at Athens.

J. Adams, Works, IV. 691.

In ancient Greece and Italy the primitive clan-assembly or township-meeting did not grow by aggregation into the assembly of the shire, but it developed into the council or ecclesia of the city.

J. Fiske, Amer. Pol. Ideas, p. 67.

2. A society for Christian worship; a church; a congregation; the Greek and Latin name, sometimes used in English writing with reference to the early church.

ecclesiast (e-kle'si-ä), a. [< ML. ecclesiastic, < L. ecclesia, the church: see ecclesia.] Ecclesiastical.

Our ecclesiast and political choices

Milton, Reformation in Eng., II.

It is not the part of a King . . . to meddle with Ecclesiastical Government.

Milton, Eikonoklastes, xiii.

ecclesiar (e-kle'si-ä), n. [< ML. ecclesiarus, a supporter of the church as against the civil power, also as adj., < L. ecclesia, the church; see ecclesia.] One who maintains the supremacy of the ecclesiastical domination over the civil power. Imp. Dict.

ecclesiarch (e-kle'si-ärk), n. [= F. ecclesiarche, < L. ekklesiarches, < Gr. ekklesia, an assembly, + arché, a leader.] 1. A ruler of the church; an ecclesiastical magistrate. Bailey, 1727.—2. In the Gr. Ch., a priest or sacerdot; a church officer who has charge of a church and its contents, and summons the worshippers, by remantrion or otherwise. In the more important churches the ecclesiarch formerly had minor officials under his authority.

ecclesiast (e-kle'si-äst), n. [< ME. ecclesiaste; = F. ecclesiaste, < L. ecclesiastes, < Gr. ekklesiastes, in classical Gr. a member of the assembly (ecclesia), < ekklesia, sit in the assembly, debate as an assembly, later call an assembly, L. ekklesia, an assembly of the people, L. ekklesia, an assembly of the people, L. ekklesia, a church: see ecclesia.] The word ekklesiastes is usually translated 'preacher,' but this is an imperfect rendering, being rather an inference from the verb ekkaleo in its later sense, 'call an assembly' (hence, by inference, give it directions or admonitions), or from the Heb. word of similar import. 1. An ecclesiastic; one who addresses the church or assembly of the faithful; a preacher or sacred orator; specifically, with the definite article, the priest, or the Preacher—that is, Solomon, or the author of the book of Ecclesiastes.

He was in church a noble ecclesiast.

Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. l. 1, 708.

Though there a thousand . . . are past

Since David's son, the saint and splendid,

The weary King Ecclesiast

Upon his awful tablets penned it

Thackeray, Vanities Vanitatum.

24. [cap.] Ecclesiastical.

Redeth Ecclesiastical of flattery

With ware, ye lord, of blue to chide.

Chaucer, Sum. Priests Tale, l. 507.

Ecclesiastes (e-kle'si-as'tes), n. [L. < Gr. ekklesiastes; the title in the Septuagint and hence in the Vulgate version of the book called in Heb. Qohélet, lit. he who calls together an assembly of the people, the gatherer of the people, fem. (in use masc.) part (< qahal, call, call together (otherwise defined 'heap together')). See ecclesiast.] One of the books of the Old Testament, also called the Preacher. Ecclesiastes is the Greek title in the Septuagint version. But preacher, in its modern signification, is not synonymous with the original. (See the etymology.) The book is a dramatic presentation of the fruitlessness of a life devoted to worldly pleasure or ambition. It purports to be a record of the experience and reflections of Solomon, to whom its authorship is often attributed, but on this point Biblical critics disagree. Often abbreviated Ecl.

ecclesiastic (e-kle'si-as'tik), a. and n. [Formerly also ecclesiastik; < F. ecclesiastique = Sp. ecclesiástico = Pg. ecclesiástico = It. ecclesiastico, ecclesiastico, ecclesiastico = Dan. ekklesiastisk = Sw. ekklesiastisk, < L. ecclesiasticus, < Gr. ekklesiastikos, of or for the assembly, L. ekklesia, of or for the church (see noun), a church officer, an ecclesiastic (cf. ekklesiastes, a member of the assembly, etc.). < ekkaleo, sit in the assembly, L. ekkaleo, to call, etc.: see ecclesia, ecclesiast.] 1. a. Ecclesiastical; specifically, pertaining to the ministry or administration of the church. [Now rare.]

And pulpit, draped ecclesiastic

Was beat with fist instead of a stick.

S. Butler, Hudibras, l. 1, 11.

An ecclesiastic person . . . ought not to go in splendid and vain ornaments. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835) II. 7.

A church of England man has a true veneration for the scheme established among us of ecclesiastical government.

Swift.

II. n. 1. In early usage, a member of the orthodox church, as distinguished from Jews, pagans, infidels, and heretics.

I must here observe farther that the name of ecclesiastic was sometimes attributed to all Christians in general.

Brinkham.

2. One holding an office in the Christian ministry, or otherwise officially consecrated to the service of the church: usually restricted to those connected with an episcopate, and in the middle ages to subordinate officials.

Among the Roman Catholics, all monks, and, in the church of England, the various dignitaries who perform the episcopal functions, are entitled ecclesiastics.

Cobb, English Synonyms, p. 389.

From a humble ecclesiastic, he was subsequently preferred to the highest dignities of the church.

Prescott.

ecclesiastical (e-kle'si-as'tik), a. [< ecclesiastic + -al.] Pertaining or relating to the church; churchly; not civil or secular; as, ecclesiastical discipline or government; ecclesiastical affairs, history, or polity; ecclesiastical courts. Sometimes abbreviated eccl., eccles.

There are in men operations, some natural, some rational, some supernatural, some politic, some finally ecclesiastical.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, l. 16.

A Bishop, as a Bishop, had never any Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction.

Selden, Table Talk, p. 22.

The Anglo-Saxon sovereigns, acting in the closest union with their bishops, made ecclesiastical laws which clothed the spiritual enactments with coercive authority.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 398.

Ecclesiastical books, in the early church, books allowed to be read in church, especially those read for edification and for the instruction of catechumens, but not belonging to the strict sense of the canon of Scripture. This name was applied to such books as those named in the sixth of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, after the canonical books of the Old Testament, as "the other books," and collected in the King James Bible under the heading "Apocrypha." Ecclesiastical calendar. See calendar.

Ecclesiastical colors. See color. Ecclesiastical commission. (a) A court appointed by Queen Elizabeth, and invested by her with nearly absolute powers, for the purpose of regulating religious opinions, and punishing all departure from the church standards either in doctrine or in ritual. It was subsequently abolished by Parliament. (b) A standing commission in England, created by Parliament in the early part of the nineteenth century, invested with important powers for the reform of the established church. Its plans have to be submitted, after due notice to persons interested, to the sovereign in council, and be ratified by orders in council; but after ratification and due publication they have the same effect as acts of Parliament.

Ecclesiastical councils. See council, 7. Ecclesiastical courts, church courts in which the canon law is administered and ecclesiastical causes are tried. In countries in which the church is established by law the decisions of these courts have a binding legal effect, and the courts constitute a part of the judicial machinery of the community. In other countries their decisions are binding only within the church, and enforced only by church discipline. In England there are several ecclesiastical courts. That of primary resort is the Consistory Court of the diocese, from it appeals go to the Court of Arches, and from there to the Privy Council. In the Protestant Episcopal Church of America the administration of discipline of lay members is wholly in the hands of the rector, an appeal lying to the bishop. The method of proceeding against clergymen in each diocese is determined by diocesan canons. A bishop is tried by the House of Bishops. In the Presbyterian Church the ecclesiastical courts are the Session, Presbytery, Synod, and General Assembly, the last being the court of last resort; in the Methodist Church trials are had before a church committee, with an appeal to the Conference; in both churches there are provisions for the constitution of courts for the trial of clergymen for false doctrine or immoral conduct. In churches of the Congregational system there are no ecclesiastical courts; the local church is the only tribunal recognized. In the Roman Catholic Church there are bishops' courts for the trial of ordinary church causes, the trial of bishops being reserved to the pope; but the methods of procedure differ according to the position of the church in different countries. Ecclesiastical epistles, in the Rom. Cath. Ch. letters written by church dignitaries officially, and carrying with them ecclesiastical authority, as apostolic epistles written by the Roman pontiff in virtue of his apostolic authority, commendatory epistles (see commendatory), dispositive epistles (see dispositive), encyclical epistles (see encyclical), pastoral epistles, and epistles of instruction to particular churches.

Ecclesiastical fast. See fast. Ecclesiastical history, the history of the church from the beginning to the present time, including both Old Testament and New Testament history; more specifically, the history of the Christian church, including both its interior and its exterior development—that is, its organization and also the development of its doctrinal beliefs. Ecclesiastical law, the law of the church as administered in the ecclesiastical courts; in a more general sense, especially in those countries where there is no church establishment, the whole body of the law relating to religion or religious institutions as administered in the civil courts. Ecclesiastical mode. See mode. Ecclesiastical moon, or calendar moon, a fictitious month used in determining the date of Easter. It is made purposely to depart from the natural month, to avoid the possibility of a coincidence of Easter with the Jewish Passover. Ecclesiastical notary. See notary. Ecclesiastical polity, the principles and laws of church government. Ecclesiastical states, the body of the clergy.

A king . . . in whose time also began that great alteration in the state ecclesiastical.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 181.

ecclesiastically (e-klē-zī-as'ti-kal-i), adv. By the church; as regards the constitution, laws, doctrines, etc., of the church.

It is both naturally and ecclesiastically good.
Jer. Taylor, Rule of Conscience, 19. 6

ecclesiasticism (e-klē-zī-as'ti-sizm), n. [ecclesiastic + -ism.] Strong adherence to the principles and organization of the church, or to ecclesiastical observances, privileges, etc.; devotion to the interests of the church and the extension of its influence in its external relations.

My religious convictions and views have remained free from any tincture of ecclesiasticism. Westminster Rev.

Puseyites and ritualists, aiming to reinforce ecclesiasticism, betray a decided leaning towards an idle print, as well as archaic ornaments.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 107.

Ethical forces for all the reforms of society are stored in the Christian church, but the battery is insulated by ecclesiasticism. N. A. Bee, CAL. 246

Ecclesiasticus (e-klē-zī-as'ti-kus), n. [L., prop. adj., of or belonging to the church: see ecclesiastic.] The name in the Latin version of the Bible, and the alternative name in the English Apocrypha, of the book called in the Septuagint "The Wisdom of Jesus, the Son of Sirach," included in the canon of the Old Testament by the Roman Catholic and Greek churches, but regarded as apocryphal by Jews and Protestants, though occasionally read in the Anglican Church. In form it resembles the Book of Proverbs. It is supposed to have been originally compiled in Hebrew or Aramaic about 180 B. C., and translated into Greek about 130 B. C. Abbreviated Ecclesi.

ecclesiography (e-klē-zī-og'grā-fī), n. [ecclesi-, the church, + gr-, γράφω, to write.] The history of churches, their locality, doctrines, polity, and condition. The Congregationalist, July 2, 1879.

ecclesiological (e-klē-zī-og'loj-i-kul), a. [ecclesiology + -al.] Of or pertaining to ecclesiology; treating of ecclesiology.

Colossians is christological, and represents Christ as the true person or plenitude of the Godhead, the totality of divine attributes and powers; Ephesians is ecclesiological, and exhibits the ideal church as the body of Christ, as the reflected person of Christ, "the fulness of Him who filleth all in all." Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church, I. § 96

Mr. Butler candidly admits that in ecclesiological and ritual knowledge he started with but a scanty outfit. Edinburgh Rev., CLXIII. 27.

ecclesiologist (e-klē-zī-og'loj-i-ist), n. [ecclesiology + -ist.] One versed in ecclesiology; an expounder of ecclesiology.

For the ecclesiologist proper there is a prodigious but dædaline, and a grand display of metal work behind the high altar. E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 282.

Ecclesiology (e-klē-zī-og'jī), n. [ecclesi-, the church, + logia, λέγω, to speak: see -ology.] 1. The science of the church as an organized society, and of whatever relates to its outward expression or manifestation.

Christology naturally precedes ecclesiology in the order of the system, as Christ precedes the church. Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church, I. § 96.

It will furnish future writers in the history and ecclesiology of Ireland with a most valuable storehouse of information. Athenæum.

2. The science of church architecture and decoration. It treats of all the details of church furniture, ornament, etc., and their symbolism, and is cultivated especially by the High Church party in the Church of England.

Eastern Ecclesiology may be divided into two grand branches, Byzantine and Armenian. J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, I. 109.

eccles-tree (ek'iz-trē), n. A dialectal variant of arletree. [Prov. Eng.]

Ecclus. An abbreviation of Ecclesiasticus.

ecceper (ek'pēr), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκκερῆς, a cutting out, an incision, < ἐκκερῆναι, cut out, < ἐκ, out, + κερῆναι, cut.] In surg., the act of cutting out; excision; specifically, a perpendicular division of the cranium by a cutting instrument.

ecceprotic (ek'p-rot'ik), a. and n. [ecce-, < Gr. ἐκκερῆς, a cutting out, < ἐκ, out, + κερῆς, dung.] 1. a. Having the quality of promoting alvine discharges; laxative; loosening; gently enanthic.

II. n. A medicine which purges gently, or which tends to promote evacuations by stool; a laxative.

Eccremocarpus (ek're-mō-kār'pus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκρεμόν, hanging from or upon (< ἐκρεμῶναι, hang from), + καρπός, fruit.] A genus of climbing shrubs, natural order Rhamn- cea, containing three species, natives of South America. They have twice-plumose leaves with small membranaceous leaflets, and green or yellow five-lobed flowers. E. guber is cultivated as an ornamental creeper.

eccrinology (ek-ri-nol'ō-jī), n. [Irreg. < Gr. ἐκκρίνω, separate (< ἐκ, out, + κρίνω, separate), + -λογία, < λέγω, speak: see -ology.] That branch of physiology which relates to the secretions and the act of secretion.

eccrisis (ek'ri-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκκρίσις, separation, < ἐκκρίνω, separated, < ἐκκρίνω, choose out, separate, < ἐκ, out, + κρίνω, separate: see crisis.] In med.: (a) The expulsion or excretion of any waste products or products of disease. (b) The excreted products themselves.

eccrictic (ek-krit'ik), n. [ec-, < Gr. ἐκκρίνω, separate, < ἐκκρίνω, separated, < ἐκκρίνω, choose out, separate, < ἐκ, out, + κρίνω, separate: see crisis.] A medicine that promotes excretion; an eliminative.

eccyesis (ek-si-ēs'is), n. [NL., < Gr. as if ἐκκρίνω, < ἐκκρίνω, bring forth, put forth as leaves, < ἐκ, forth, + κρίνω, be pregnant.] Extra-uterine gestation, or the development of the fetus outside of the cavity of the uterus, as in a Fallopian tube, an ovary, or the abdominal cavity.

eccyliosis (ek-sil-i-ō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκκυλίωσις, be unrolled (develop) (< ἐκ, out, + κυλίω, roll up: see cylinder), + -osis.] In pathol., a disease or disturbance of development; a disorder resulting from the process of development.

ecderon (ek'de-ron), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκ, out, + δερμα, skin.] An outer layer of integument, as the epithelial layer of mucous membrane, or the epidermal layer of the skin: distinguished from enderon, the deeper layer.

ecderonic (ek-de-ron'ik), a. [ecderon + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the ecderon; epidermal or epithelial.

Teeth in Mollusca and Annelosa are always ecderonic, cuticular, or epithelial structures. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 80.

ecdysis (ek'di-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκδύσις, a getting out, < ἐκδύω, get out of, strip off, < ἐκ, out, + δύω, get into, enter.] The act of putting off, coming out of, or emerging; the act of shedding or casting an outer coat or integument, as in the case of serpents and certain insects, or the feathers of birds; the molt: opposed to endysis.

ecgonine (ek'gō-nin), n. [ec-, < Gr. ἐκγονος, born (as a noun, a child) (< ἐκ, out of, + γονός, born: see -gon), + -ine.] In chem., a base obtained from cocaine by the action of hydrochloric acid. It is soluble in water.

échancrure (F. pron. ā-shōn-krūr'), n. [F., a hollowing out, scallop, slope, < échancrer, cut sloping, lit. cut crabwise, < é, < L. ex, out, + chancrer, < L. cancer, a crab: see cancer.] In anat. and zool., a notch, nick, or indentation, as on the edge or surface of a part; an emargination; a shallow fissure. It is more than a mere depression, and less than a furecation or forfication.

échauguette (F. pron. ā-shō-ge't'), n. [F., a watch-turret, < OF. échauguette, eschalguette, oldest form eschargate (ML. reflex. seargate), orig. a company on guard, then a single sentinel, then a sentry-box, watch-turret (cf. Walloon searwater, be on the watch), < OHG. skarwakta*, MHG. schorwate (G. schorwache), < OHG. skara, MHG. skar, a company, a division or detail of an army, a crowd, + wakte*, MHG. wachte, G. wacht, a watch, > OF. waite, quite, E. wait: see wait.] A bartizan.

echē², r. t. An obsolete form of eka.

echē³, a. A Middle English form of ache.

echē⁴, a. [ME., earlier ecce, < AS. ēce, everlasting, eternal; cf. OS. ēwig = OFries. ēwīk, ēwig = D. ewig = OHG. ēwic, MHG. ēwic, ever, G. ewig = Dan. Sw. ewig, everlasting, eternal. < OHG. ēwa, etc., = Goth. auws, an age, eternity: see ay, age, etc.] Everlasting; eternal.

Than like song that ever is echē.
Out and Nightingale, l. 742.

In helle heo echelle forterne
On echē eorðmoðe.
Old Eng. Miscellany (ed. Morris), p. 72.

echelon (esh'e-lon), n. [echelon (= Sp. escalón), a round of a ladder, a step, stepping-stone, echelon, < échelle, OF. eschelle = Fr. Sp. escale = It. scala, < L. scala, a ladder: see scale.] A step-like arrangement or order; specifically, a military disposition of troops of such a nature that each division, brigade, regiment, company, or other body occupies a position parallel to, but not in the same alignment with, that in front, thus presenting the appearance of steps, and capable of being formed into one line by moving each of the less advanced divisions, etc., forward until they all align. Troops so disposed are said to be in echelon. A fleet is said to be in echelon when it presents a wedge-form to the enemy, so that the bow-guns and broadsides of the several ships can defend one another.

The batteries moved in echelon by the hill-top as well as they could. W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II. 166

The friends were standing where the Catekill hills lay before them in echelon towards the river, the ridges lapping over each other and receding in the distance. C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 54.

echelon (esh'e-lon), v. t. [echelon, n.] To form in echelon.

The Russian army of the Lom in the end of July was echeloned along the road to Rastchuk, waiting for the word to surround that fortress. Arch. Forbes, Souvenirs of some Continents, p. 128.

echelon-lens (esh'e-lon-lenz), n. A compound lens used for lighthouses, having a series of concentric annular lenses arranged round a central lens, so that all have a common focus.

echeneidan (ek-e-nē'idān), n. A fish of the family Echeneididae. Sir J. Richardson.

echeneidid (ek-e-nē'idid), n. A fish of the family Echeneididae.

Echeneididae (ek'e-nē'id'id-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Echeneis (-id-) + -idae.] A family of teleostean fishes, representing the suborder Diacephala, and typified by the genus Echeneis. The body is elongated, broad in front, and tapering to the caudal fin; the head is flat, horizontal above, and surmounted by an oval disk. This disk is composed of numerous (10 to 25) transverse bars, pectinated behind and divided into pairs by a median longitudinal leathery partition, and is surrounded by a leathery margin. This formation is homologous with a set of dorsal spines, and is in fact an extremely modified dorsal fin. A normal dorsal is developed on the hinder part of the body, and the anal nearly corresponds to it. The ventrals are thoracic in position, and have 5 rays, and a slender spine closely attached to the adjoining ray. By means of the disk, acting as a sucker, these fishes attach themselves to other animals. They are known to sailors and fishermen as suckers or sucking-fishes. About a dozen species are known; the most common are Echeneis muricata and Remora remora. Also Echeneis, Echeneidini. See plait-fish, remora.

Echeneidini (ek-e-nē'id'id-nī), n. pl. [NL., < Echeneis (-id-) + -ini.] Same as Echeneididae. Bonaparte, 1837.

echeneidoid (ek-e-nē'id'id-oid), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Echeneididae.

II. n. A fish of the family Echeneididae.

Echeneis (ek-e-nē'id-ē), n. [L., < Gr. ἐχένη (-id-), the remora, supposed to have the power of holding ships back, prop. adj., ship-holding. < ἐχέω, hold, + νῆα = L. navis, a ship.] The typical genus of the family Echeneididae, having on the top of the head a large, flat, laminated disk or sucker, composed of numerous transverse plates set obliquely upward and backward, forming an adhesive surface by which the fish attaches itself to various objects, as a larger fish, a ship's bottom, etc. The type is the common remora or sucking-fish, E. muricata. By some it is extended to include all the species of the family, and by others restricted to elongated slender species with numerous plates to the suckers, like E. muricata.

Sucking-fish (Echeneis remora).

echœum (ē-kē'um), n.; pl. echœa (-ā). [L. echœa, < Gr. ἑχία, pl. of ἑχίον, a kind of loud kettle-drum or gong, < ἑχός, ἑχέ, a sound, esp. a loud sound, roar, ἑχέω, sound, ring: see echo.] In arch., one of the sonorous bell-shaped vases of bronze or clay which the ancients are said to have introduced in the construction of their theaters to give greater power to the voices of the actors. See acoustic vessel, under acoustic.

Echeveria (ech-e-vē'ri-ā), n. [NL., named after Echeverri, a botanic artist.] A genus of succulent plants, natural order Crasulaceæ, chiefly natives of Mexico. It is now included in the genus Cotyledon.

echiaster (ek-i-as'tēr), n. [NL., prop. echinaster (which is used in another application: see Echinaster), < Gr. ἐχίνος, hedgehog, + αστήρ, a star.] 1. A kind of stellate sponge-spicule. Solms.—2. [esp.] A genus of coleopterous insects. Erichson.

Echidna (e-kid'nā), n. [NL., < L. echidna, < Gr. ἐχίδνα, an adder, viper, < ἐχέω, an adder, viper: see Echis.] 1. In ichth., a genus of anguilliform fishes: generally accounted a synonym of Mura-

Forster, 1778. [Not in use.] — 2. In Aerpet., a genus of reptiles: used by Wagner and others for the genus of snakes (Fiperidae) called Stie by Gray and Cope. Merron, 1820. [Not in use.] — 3. In mammal.: (a) The typical genus of the family Echidnidae, containing the aculeated anteater or spiny anteater of Australia and Tasmania, E. hystrix or aculeata, and another species, E. laevis of New Guinea, together with a fossil one, E. oventi. They have 5 toes on each foot; the snout is straight and moderately developed. Tachyglossus is the same, and is the name properly to be used for this genus according to zoological rules of nomenclature, the name Echidna having been preoccupied in another sense, though it has most currency in this sense. See Amantoglossus, ant-eater. Cuvier, 1797. (b) [l. c.]

A species of the genus Echidna or family Echidnidae. The echidna resembles a large hedgehog, excepting that the spines are much longer, and the snout is long and slender, with a small aperture at the end for the protrusion of the long, flexible, worm-like tongue. The animal is nocturnal, fossorial, and insectivorous, and catches insects with its long, sticky tongue, whence it is known as the porcupine ant-eater. The echidna is closely related to the Ornithorhynchus, or duck-billed platypus, and, like it, is oviparous.

4. A genus of echinodermata. De Blainville, 1830. Echidna (e-kid'nā), n. pl. [NL., pl. of echidna, < L. echidna, an adder, viper: see Echidna.] A group of bombycid moths. Hübner, 1816.

Echidnidae (e-kid'ni-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echidna + -idae.] The family of monotrematous ornithodermian or prototherian mammals constituted by the genera Echidna (or Tachyglossus) and Zaglossus (or Acanthoglossus). They have, in addition to the ordinal and superordinal characters which they share with Ornithorhynchidae, convoluted cerebral hemispheres, perforated acetabulum, as in birds, the facial region of the skull produced into a long, slender rostrum with the nostrils at its end, styliform mandibular ram, vermiform protrusile tongue, no true teeth, feet not webbed, but furnished with long claws, and no tibial spur. The family is properly called Tachyglossidae.

Zaglossus or Acanthoglossus brevipes

Echidnina (ek-id-ni'nā), n. pl. [NL., < Echidna + -ina.] A group of mammals represented by Echidna. Bonaparte, 1837.

echidnine (e-kid'ni-nin), n. [< L. echidna, viper, + -ine.] Serpent-poison; the secretion from the poison-glands of the viper and other serpents. Echidnine is a clear, viscid, neutral, yellowish fluid, containing albumin, mucus, fatty matter, a yellow coloring principle, and, among its salts, phosphates and chlorides. Associated with the albumin is a peculiar nitrogenous body, to which the name echidnine is more particularly applied. The poison bag of a viper seldom contains more than 2 grains of the poisonous liquid; 1/4 of a grain is sufficient to kill a small bird.

Echimyidae (ek-i-mi'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echymys + -idae.] A family of hystricomorphic rodents, taking name from the genus Echymys. Also Echinomyidae.

Echimyina (e-ki-mi'i-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Echymys + -ina.] A subfamily of hystricomorphic rodents, of the family Octodontidae, related to the porcupines; the hedgehog-rats. It is a large group of numerous genera, differing much in external form and aspect. The African ground pig, Aulacoceros aethiopicus, belongs to this subfamily, as do the West Indian genera Caprimys and Plagiodon. (See cut under Aulacoceros.) All the rest of the genera are South American. Of these the oryzomys, Myndomys oryza, is the best-known form, though not a typical one. (See cut under oryzomys.) The most representative genera are Echymys and Lonchoceros, or the spiny rats proper, of which there are a dozen or more species, having prickles in the fur. Coromys, Dasydromys, and Monomys are other examples without spines. Caracaras is a fossil genus from the bone caves of Brazil. Also written Echimyina, Echimyina, Echimyina, and, more correctly, Echinomyina.

Echimyina (ek-i-mi'i-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Echimyina + -ina.] Same as Echinomyina.

Echymys (e-ki'mis), n. [NL., contr. of Echymys, lit. 'hedge-rat' (so called from the fact that the pelage is bristly or mixed with flattened spines). < Gr. ēxymos, a hedgehog, + mys = E. mouse.] The typical genus of the subfamily Echimyina; the spiny rats proper. All the species are South American; E. oryza is the best-known. Geoffroy, 1810. Also written Echymys, and properly Echinomyis.

Spiny Rat, Echymys cavendishii.

echin, n. [ME., < L. echinus: see echinus.] A sea-hedgehog; a sea-urchin.

Men . . . known while he strolled habundant most of teudre fishes or of sharpe fishes that by echinus. Chaucer, Boethius, p. 82.

Echinacea (ek-i-nā'sē-i), n. [NL., so called on account of the long spinose bracts of the columnar receptacle). < Gr. ēxymos, a hedgehog, + -acea.] A genus of coarse composite plants of the prairies of North America, allied to Rudbeckia, but with long rose-colored rays and prickly-pointed chaff. There are two species, which are occasionally cultivated. Their thick black roots have a pungent taste, and are used in popular medicine under the name of black-sampson.

Echinarachnius (e-ki-nā-rak'ni-us), n. [NL. (Læke, 1778), < Gr. ēxymos, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + arachne, a spider.] A genus of flat, irregular petalostichous sea-urchins, of the family Melitidae (or Scutellidae), with no perforations or lunules. E. parva, of the Pacific and Atlantic coasts of the United States, is known as the sand dollar or cake urchin. E. exentata is the common cake urchin of the Pacific coast. See cut under cake urchin.

Echinaster (ek-i-nās'tēr), n. [NL., < Gr. ēxymos, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + aster, a star.] A genus of starfishes, of the family Solasteridae.

Echinaster ventus.

E. aspositus is an example. E. ventus is a West Indian species, extending northward on the Atlantic coast of the United States, having the spines sheathed in membrane and occurring only at the angles of the calcareous plates of the upper surface. Cribella is a synonym.

Echinasteridae (e-ki-nās'tēr-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinaster + -idae.] A family of starfishes with two rows of tube-feet, a skeletal frame of lengthened ossicles, and spines on those of the dorsal surface; a synonym of Solasteridae.

echinate (ek'i-nāt), n. [< L. echinatus, set with prickles, prickly, < echinus, a hedgehog: see echinus.] Spiny, like a hedgehog; bristling with sharp points; bristly. An echinate surface is one thickly covered with sharp elevations like spines bristling, and is to be distinguished from a muricate surface, in which the elevations are scattered, lower, and not so acute.

echinated (ek'i-nā-ted), a. [< echinate + -ed.] Redged prickly or bristly.

Fibre echinated by laterally projecting spicules.

Londonfeld.

Echini (e-ki'ni), n. pl. [L., pl. of echinus, a hedgehog, sea-urchin: see echinus.] 1. In Cuvier's system of classification, the second family of pedicellate echinoderms, containing the sea-urchins: equivalent to several modern families, or to the whole of the order or class Echinoides. — 2. [l. c.] Plural of echinus.

echinid (ek'i-nid), n. One of the Echini.

Echinida (e-kin'i-dē), n. pl. Same as Echini.

Echinidae (e-kin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinus + -idae.] A family of regular desmostichous or endocyclic sea-urchins, of the order Endocycli and class Echinoides, having a thin round shell with broad ambulacral spaces bearing tubercles and spines, the latter mostly short and pyriform, and oral branchia: the typical sea-urchin or sea-egg. The genera are numerous, such as Echinus, Echinothrix, Tharopneustes, etc.

echinidan (e-kin'i-dan), n. A sea-urchin; one of the Echini.

echiniform (e-ki'ni-fōrm), a. In entom., same as echinoid.

Echiniscus (ek-i-nis'kus), n. [NL., < Gr. ēxymos, a hedgehog, + -iscus, dim. suffix.] A genus of bear-animalcules or water-bears, of the family Macrobiotidae; a synonym is Emydium. E. hellermanni is an example.

echinital (e-kin'i-tal), a. [< echinita + -al.] Pertaining to an echinite or fossil sea-urchin.

echinite (e-ki'nit), n. [< Gr. ēxymos, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + -ite.] A fossil sea-urchin.

Echinites are found in all fossiliferous strata, but are most abundant and best preserved in the Chalk. The term is an indefinite one, these fossils being of various genera, as Goniocrinus, Echinocrinus, etc. The Palaeozoic echinites form an order Palaeochinoides, represented by such genera as Palaeochinus, Leontodonta, etc. See cut under Echinocrinus.

Echinobothria (e-ki-nō-both'ri-ā), n. pl. [NL. (Rudolphi), pl. of Echinobothrium.] A group named for the cestoid worms. See Echinobothrium.

Echinobothrium (e-ki-nō-both'ri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ēxymos, a hedgehog, + bothros, dim. of bothros, a pit, trench.] A genus of cestoid worms, or tapeworms, of the family Haptyllidae, having on the head two fossolites with hooks. The separated proglottides continue to live and grow for some time independently. E. minimum and E. typus are examples. Also Echinobothrium.

Echinobryasidae (e-ki-nō-brys'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinobryas + -idae.]

A family of irregular sea-urchins, typified by the genus Echinobryas.

Echinobryasus (e-ki-nō-brys'us), n. [NL., prop. Echinobryasus, < Gr. ēxymos, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + bryasus, a kind of sea-urchin.] The typical genus of the family Echinobryasidae.

Echinocactus (e-ki-nō-kak'tus), n. [NL., < Gr. ēxymos, a hedgehog, + cactus, cactus.]

A genus of cactaceous plants, globose or oval, and sometimes gigantic, strongly ribbed, or with tubercles in vertical or spiral rows. They are armed with clusters of short spines, at the base of which, upon the younger parts of the plant, are borne the large and showy flowers. Over 200 species have been described, mostly Mexican, with a considerable number within the limits of the United States.

Echinocactus viridescens.

Echinocardium (e-ki-nō-kār'di-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ēxymos, a hedgehog, + cardus = E. heart.]

A genus of spatangoid sea-urchins, or heart-urchins, of the family Spatangulidae. E. cordatum occurs on both coasts of the Atlantic. Leake, 1778. Also called Amphidontus.

echinochrome (e-ki-nō-krom), n. [< Gr. ēxymos, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + chroma, color.] See the extract.

Dr. C. A. MacMunn describes the spectroscopic or chemical characters of the blood of various worms and mollusks. One of the most interesting pigments which he has detected is that which he calls echinochrome, . . . obtained from the perivisceral cavity of Strongylocentrotus lividus. Jour. Roy. Microsc. Soc., 2d ser., VI. l. 48.

echinococci, n. Plural of echinococcus.

Echinococcifer (e-ki-nō-kok'ni-fēr), n. [NL., < echinococcus + -ifer = E. bear.] A genus of tapeworms, in which, in the hydatid state, the tentacles head bud in special brood-capsules in such a way that their invagination is turned toward the lumen of the vesicle, as in the echinococcus of Tenax echinococcus. Claus.

echinococcus (e-ki-nō-kok'us), n.; pl. echinococci (-i). [NL., < Gr. ēxymos, a hedgehog, + coccus, a berry: see coccus.] Tenax echinococcus in its larval (sclex) stage, which form the so-called hydatids occurring in the liver, brain, etc., of man and other animals; the hydatid form of the wandered scolex of Tenia echinococcus, having deuteroscolex or daughter-cysts formed by gemination. This hydatid is that of the tapeworm of the dog, having several tenia heads in the cyst; it may occur in man, commonly in the liver, giving rise to very serious disease. The word was originally a genus name, given by Rudolphi before the relationship to Tenia was known; it is now used as the name of the larval stage of the tapeworm whose specific name is the same. See cut under Tenia.

In Echinococcus the structure of the cystic worm is complicated by its proliferation, the result of which is the formation of many bladder-worms, enclosed one within the other, and contained in a strong laminated sac or cyst, apparently of a chitinous nature, secreted by the parasite. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 136.

Echinocoelidæ (e-ki-nō-kō-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinocoelus + -idæ.] A family of fossil regular sea-urchins.

Echinocentrus (e-ki-nō-kō-nus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνος, a hedgehog, + κέντρον, a cone; see con-.] The typical genus of Echinocentridæ. Breyn.

Echinocoridae (e-ki-nō-kō-rī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinocorus + -idæ.] A family of irregular sea-urchins, chiefly of the Cretaceous formation.

Echinocorus (ek-i-nō-kō-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνος, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + (1) κόρυς, a bug.] The typical genus of Echinocoridae. Schrdör.

Echinocrepis (e-ki-nō-kre-pis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνος, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + κρηπίς, a boot.] A genus of spatangoid sea-urchins, or heart-urchins, of the family Spatangidae, of a triangular form, with the anal system on the lower or actinal surface. E. cuneata is a deep-sea form of southern seas. Agassiz, 1879.

Echinocystis (e-ki-nō-sis-tis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνος, a hedgehog, + κύστις, a bladder; see cyst.] A cucurbitaceous genus of plants of the eastern United States, of a single annual species, E. lobata. It has numerous white flowers, and an oval, prickly fruit, which becomes dry and bladders, and opens at the top for the discharge of the seeds. It is frequently cultivated for ornament, and is known as the wild balsam-apple. By some authorities the genus is extended to include Megarrhiza and other western and Mexican species.

Echinoderes (ek-i-nō-dē-res), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνος, a hedgehog, + δέρμα, neck.] A singular genus of minute worm-like animals of uncertain position, supposed to be intermediate in some respects between the wheel-animalcules and the crustaceans. The rounded head is furnished with recurved hooks, and is succeeded by 10 or 11 distinct segments, the last of which is bifurcated; the segments bear paired setae; there are no limbs, and the nervous system appears to be represented by a single cephalic ganglion; and eye spots are present. It is the typical genus of the family Echinoderidae. E. dujardini is an example. It is a small marine worm, scarcely half a millimeter long, with a distinct retractile head, caudal setae, and ten rings of setae along the body, giving an appearance of segmentation.

Echinoderes dujardini, greatly enlarged.

Echinoderidae (e-ki-nō-dē-rī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinoderes + -idæ.] A family of animalcules, by some considered related to the rotifers, based upon the genus Echinoderes. It is often located with the gastrotrichous worms.

Echinoderidae, which Dujardin and Greef regarded as connecting links between Velum and Arthropoda. Claus, Zoology (trans.), I. 434.

echinoderm (e-ki-nō-dēr-m), a. and n. [Echinodermata.] I. a. Having a prickly covering; echinodermatous.

II. n. Any one of the Echinodermata.

All echinoderms have a calcareous skeleton, and many are provided with movable spines. A characteristic apparatus of vessels, termed the ambulacral or water vascular system, is present. It is composed of a ring round the pharynx, from which proceed a number of radiating canals, commonly giving off caecal appendages (Pollen vessels), as well as branches which enter the retractile tube feet, often furnished with a terminal disk or sucker, which with the spines are the organs of locomotion. The madreporic canal connects the pharyngeal ring with the exterior. Pagse, Zool. Class., p. 40.

echinodermal (e-ki-nō-dēr-māl), a. [Echinodermata + -al.] Same as echinodermatous.

The harder, spine clad or echinodermatous purple, the most patient and persevering dissolver by the extreme complexity and diversity of their constituent parts. Owen, Anat., x.

Echinodermaria (e-ki-nō-dēr-mā-rī-ā), n. pl. [NL., as Echinodermata + -aria.] A group of echinoderms. De Blainville, 1830.

Echinodermata (e-ki-nō-dēr-mā-tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of echinodermatus; see echinodermatous.] A phylum or subkingdom of metazoic animals; the echinoderms. They represent one of the most distinct types of the animal kingdom, agreeing with coelenterates in having a radially symmetrical arrangement of parts, usually pentamerous or by fives or tens, a digestive canal, a water-vascular or ambulacral apparatus, a true blood-vascular system, and the integument indurated by calcareous deposits, as either granules, spicules, or hard plates forming a shell. The alimentary canal is distinct from the general body-cavity; there is a deuterostomatous oral orifice or mouth, and usually an anus. The sexes are mostly distinct. The species undergo metamorphosis; the free-swimming ciliated embryo is known as a pluteus, in some cases as an echinopluteus (see cut under echinopluteus); the adult form is usually associated with a complicated kind of secondary development from the larval form, which is mostly bilateral. The Echinodermata were so named by Klein in 1734, and in Cuvier's system were the first class of his Radiata; they are still sometimes reduced to a class with the Ctenophora. As a subkingdom they are divisible into four classes: Crinoidæ, Echinoidæ, Asteroidæ, and Holothuroidea, or the crinoids, sea-urchins, starfishes, and sea-cucumbers. As a class they are sometimes divided directly into seven orders: Echinoides (sea-urchins), Asteroides (starfishes), Ophiuroidea (eurypterids and brittle-stars), Crinoides (feather stars), Cyathoides (extinct), Blasidoides (extinct), and Holothuroidea (sea-cucumbers). All are marine. Also Echinodermata.

The organization of the Echinodermata does in fact appear so different from that of the coelenterates, and seems to belong to a so much higher grade of development, that the combination of the two groups as Radiata is inadvisable, and so much the more so since the radial arrangement of the structure exhibits some transitions towards a bilateral symmetry. The Echinodermata are separated from the Ctenophora by the possession of a separate alimentary canal and vascular system, and also by a number of peculiar features both of organization and of development. Claus, Zoology (trans.), I. 267.

echinodermatous (e-ki-nō-dēr-mā-tus), a. [Echinodermata + -ous.] Echinodermatous, a. [Echinodermata + -ous.] Having a spiculate or indurated skin; specifically, of or pertaining to the echinoderms or Echinodermata. Also echinodermal.

Echinodes (ek-i-nō-dēs), n. [NL. (Le Conte, 1869), < Gr. ἐχίνος, like a hedgehog, prickly, < ἐχίνος, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + δέρμα, form.] I. In entom., a genus of beetles, of the family Histeridae, with two North American species, E. setiger and E. decipiens.—2. A genus of insectivorous mammals: same as Hemiteles.

Echinoglossa (e-ki-nō-glos-sā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνος, a hedgehog, + γλῶσσα, the tongue.] A grade or series of Mollusca, represented by the gastropods, cephalopods, pteropods, and scaphopods, as collectively distinguished from the Laploglossa (which see) alone. In E. R. Lankester's arrangement of Mollusca the Echinoglossa are divided into three classes: Gastropoda, Cephalopoda (including Pteropoda), and Scaphopoda. Odontophora is a synonym.

echinoglossal (e-ki-nō-glos-sāl), a. and n. [Echinoglossa + -al.] I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Echinoglossa. II. n. A member of the Echinoglossa.

echinoid (e-ki-nōid), a. and n. [Echinoides + -oid.] I. a. Having the form or appearance of a sea-urchin: in entomology, applied to certain insect-eggs which are shaped like an echinus, and covered with crowded deep pits.—2. Pertaining to the Echinoidea.

II. n. In zool., one of the Echinoidea.

The spheroidal echinoids, in reality, depart further from the general plan and from the embryonic form than the elongated spatangoids do. Huxley, Lay Sermons, p. 223.

Echinoidea (ek-i-nōidē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Echinus + -oidea.] A class of the phylum or subkingdom Echinodermata; the sea-urchins or sea-eggs. They have a rounded, depressed (not elongated) form, sub-spherical, cordiform, or discoid, inclosed in a test or shell composed of many calcareous plates closely and usually immovably connected, studded with tubercles and bearing movable spines, and perforated in some places for the emission of tube-feet; an oral and anal orifice always present, a convoluted intestine, a water vascular system, a blood vascular system, and sometimes respiratory system as well as ambulacral appendages. The perforated plates are the ambulacra, alternating with imperforate interambulacral plates; there are usually five pairs of each. The anus is dorsal or superior, the mouth ventral or inferior; the latter in many forms has a complicated internal skeleton. The general arrangement of parts is radially symmetrical, with meridional divisions of parts; but bilaterally recognizable in many adults, and perfectly expressed in the larval forms. The Echinoidea are divisible into Regularia, Desmochia, or Endocyclina, containing the ordinary symmetrically globose forms, as Cidaris, Echinus, and Echinomys, and the Irregularia, Paleodonta, or Eurychorda, containing the cake-urchins and heart-urchins, or the alcyonoids and spatangoids (respectively sometimes elevated into the orders Cassidulida and Spatangida); together with the Paleozoic echinoids, which in some systems constitute a third order, Paleochinoidea. Also Echinoidea.

a, mouth; g, gullet; b, teeth; c, lips; d, alveoli; e, salivary duct; f, auricular; g, retractor; h, protractor; i, muscles of Aristotle's lantern; k, madreporic canal; l, circular ambulacral vessel; m, Pollen vessel; n, o, p, ambulacral vessels; q, r, pedal vessels; s, t, pedicels; u, v, spines; w, tubercle; x, tubercle to which a spine is articulated; y, z, pedicellariæ; aa, anus; bb, madreporic tubercle; cc, ocular spot.

Echinolampadidæ (e-ki-nō-lam-pad-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinolampas (-pad-) + -idæ.] A family of irregular sea-urchins. See Cassidulidæ. Also Echinolampadæ.

Echinolampas (e-ki-nō-lam-pas), n. [NL., also Echinolampas; < Gr. ἐχίνος, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + λαμπή, λαμπάς (-pad-), a torch; see lamp.] A genus of irregular sea-urchins, of the family Cassidulidæ, or giving name to a family Echinolampadidæ.

Echinometra (e-ki-nō-met-rā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχινόμετρον, the largest kind of sea-urchin, < ἐχίνος, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + μέτρον, womb.]

Echinometra oblongata, with spines in part removed to show the plates of the test.

The typical genus of regular sea-urchins of the family Echinometridæ. E. oblongata is an example.

Echinometridæ (e-ki-nō-met-rī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinometra + -idæ.] A family of regular desmochous or endocyclical sea-urchins, of the order Enderyalea or Cidaridea, having a long oval shell, imperforate tubercles, oral branchiae, and ambulacral areas in areas of more than three pairs of pores. Echinometra and Poliochorda are the leading genera.

Echinomyia (e-ki-nō-mī-i-ā), n. [NL. (Duméril, 1806), < Gr. ἐχίνος, a hedgehog, + μύια, a fly.] A genus of flies, of the family Tachinidae, comprising large bristly species of a black or blackish-gray color, usually with reddish-yellow sides of the abdomen or with glistening white bands. Among them are the largest European flies of the family Muscida in a broad sense, but none have yet been found in America. They are parasitic upon caterpillars. Also Echinomyia.

Echinomys (e-ki-nō-mī-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinomys + -idæ.] Same as Echinomyia.

Echinomyiæ (e-ki-nō-mī-i-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinomys + -inæ.] Same as Echinomyia.

Echinomys (e-ki-nō-mis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνος, a hedgehog, + μῦς = E. mouse.] Same as Echinomys. Wagner, 1840.

Echinoneidæ (e-ki-nō-nē-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinoneus + -idæ.] A family of irregular sea-urchins, typified by the genus Echinoneus. Also written Echinonidæ and Echinoneides.

Echinonematæ (e-ki-nō-nē-mā-tā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνος, a hedgehog, + νήμα, νήμα, a thread, < νήμις, spin.] A subordinal or other group of ceratollicious sponges, having spicules of two or more kinds, there being smooth, double-pointed ones in the ceratode, and rough, single-pointed ones standing partly erect.

Echinoneus (ek-i-nō-nē-us), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνος, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + νήμα = E. new.] A genus of irregular sea-urchins, of the family Cassidulidæ, or giving name to a family Echinoneidæ.

escheque: see checky. In her., same as checky.

Also written schizoth.

Echis (ek'is), n. [NL., < Gr. ēxē, an adder, viper, akin to L. anguis, a snake: see Anguis and anger.] A genus of Indian vipers, of the family Viperidae, including venomous scolioglyph forms of small size, having fewer ventral scutes than the African vipers, simple subcaudal scutes, imbricated carinate scales on the head, in two rows between the eyes and the labial plates, and small nostrils in a large divided nasal plate. E. carinata is a common species, 20 inches or less in length. Merrem, 1820. Called Toxicea by Gray.

Echitonium (ek-i-tō-ni-um), n. [NL., < L. echitis, a kind of clematis; or < L. echitis, Gr. ēxē, a kind of stone; < Gr. ēxē, an adder, viper: see Echis.] A genus of fossil plants, instituted by Unger. The genus is phanerogamous, and is said by Schimper to be analogous to Echites of Linnaeus, an intertropical boraginaceous genus of plants occurring in Asia and America. They are found in various localities in central Europe in the Tertiary.

Echium (ek'i-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ēxē, a plant (Echium rubrum), < ēxē, a viper: see Echis.] A genus of boraginaceous plants, tall hairy herbs or somewhat shrubby, natives of the old world. There are about 60 species, chiefly of the Mediterranean region and South Africa, of which the common viper's-bugloss, or blueweed, E. vulgare, with showy blue flowers, has become naturalized in some parts of the United States.

Echiuridae (ek-i-ū-ri-dæ), n. pl. [NL., < Echiurus + -idae.] The leading family of Echiuroidea or chaetiferous gephyreans, having the oral end of the body produced into a grooved proboscis, containing the long esophageal commissures which meet in front without ganglionic enlargement, and having on the ventral side two hooked setae anteriorly, with sometimes circles of setae posteriorly, the mouth below the proboscis at its base, and the anus terminal. The leading genera are Echiurus, Donellia, and Thalassoma. The Echiuridae are made by Lankoster a class of the animal kingdom under the phylum Gephyrea.

echiuroid (ek-i-ū-roid), a. and n. [Echiurus + -oid.] I. a. Chaetiferous, as a gephyrean; of or pertaining to the Echiuroidea.

II. n. A member of the Echiuroidea.

Echiuroidea (ek-i-ū-roi-dō-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Echiurus + -oidea.] An order of Gephyrea, the chaetiferous gephyreans. They have a terminal anus, and a mouth at the base of a preoral proboscis. The group contains the families Echiuridae and Sternaspidae, and is equivalent to a gephyrean order Chaetifera.

The Echiuroidea or chaetiferous gephyreans present no external segmentation of their elongated and contractile body; they have, however, in the young state, the rudiments of 16 metameres. (Claus, Zoology (trans.), I. 389.)

Echiurus (ek-i-ū-rus), n. [NL. (for "Echidurus"), < Gr. ēxē (ēxē), an adder, viper, & ōipá, a tail.] A genus of chaetiferous gephyreans (one of the group Chaetifera of Gegenbaur), armed with two strong setae on the ventral side (whence the name). The outsole develops chitinous processes, and there is a communication between the rectum and the perivisceral cavity by means of a pair of tubular organs which are ciliated internally and at their apertures. It is the typical genus of the family.

Echiurus Gueveneri, about natural size.

echo (ek'ō), n.; pl. echoes (-ōz). [Altered (after L.) from earlier spelling; early mod. E. also echoc, echo; < ME. eccho, ekko = D. G. echo = Dan. echo, ekko = Sw. eko = OF. eco, F. écho = Sp. eco = Pg. eco, eco = It. eco, < L. echo (M.L. also eccho), < Gr. ēxē, a sound, an echo; cf. ēxē, ēxē, a sound, noise, ēxē, sound, ring, etc.] 1. A sound repeated by reflection or reverberation from some obstructing surface; sound heard again at its source; repercussion of sound: as, an echo from a distant hill. Sound being produced by waves or pulses of the air, when such waves meet an opposing surface, as a wall, they are reflected like light-waves (see reflection): the sound so heard, as if originating behind the reflecting surface, is an echo. The echo of a sound returns to the point whence the sound originated if the reflecting surface is at right angles to a line drawn to it from that point. An oblique surface reflects the sound in another direction, so that it may be heard elsewhere, though not at the point where the sound originated. If the direct and reflected sounds succeed one another with great rapidity, which happens when the reflecting surface is near, the echo only clouds the original sound, but is not heard distinctly; and it is such indistinct echoes that interfere with the hearing in churches and other large buildings. An interval of about one ninth of a second is necessary to discriminate two successive sounds; and as sound passes through the atmosphere at the rate of about 1,125 feet in a second, of 1,125, or about 62 feet, will be the least distance at which an echo can be heard; and this will be distinct only in the case of a sharp, sudden sound. The walls of a house or the ramparts of a city, the surface of a cloud, a wood, rocks, mountains and valleys produce echoes. Some echoes are remarkable for their frequency of repetition, and are called multiple or tautological echoes.

Folweth Ekko, that holdeth no silence,
But ever answereth at the counter-taille.
Chaucer, Clerk's Tale, I. 1182.

The babbling echo mocks the hounds,
Replying shrilly to the well-tun'd horns,
As if a double hunt were heard at once.
Shak., Tit. And., II. 8.

The Scriptures are God's voice; the church is his echo, a redoubling, a repeating of some particular syllables and accents of the same voice.
Donne, Sermons, xiv.

Blow, bugle, blow, set the wild echoes flying,
And answer, echoes, answer, dying, dying, dying.
Tennyson, Princess, III. (song).

2. [cap.] In classical myth., an oread or mountain nymph, who, according to a usual form of the myth, pined away for love of the beautiful youth Narcissus till nothing remained of her but her voice.

Sweet Echo, sweetest nymph, that liv'st unseen Within thy very shell.
Milton, Comus, I. 230.

3. Figuratively, a repetition of the sentiments of others; reproduction of the ideas or opinions of others, either in speech or in writing.

It is the folly of too many to mistake the echo of a London coffeehouse for the voice of the kingdom.
Swift, Conduct of the Allies.

4. In music, the very soft repetition of a short phrase, particularly in orchestral or organ music. In large organs an echo-organ is sometimes provided for echo like effects; it consists of pipes shut up in a tight box, or removed to a distance from the organ proper, and controlled by a separate keyboard or by separate stops. A single stop so used or placed is called an echo-stop.

5. In arch., a wall or vault, etc., having the property of reflecting sound or of producing an echo.

6. [cap.] [NL.] In zool., a genus of neopterous insects. Selys, 1853.—7. In chess-playing, a response to a partner's signal for trumps.—To the echo, so as to produce a reverberation of sound; hence, loudly; vehemently; so as to excite attention and response: chiefly used with applaud or similar words.

I would applaud thee to the very echo,
That would applaud again.
Shak., Macbeth, v. 3.

echo (ek'ō), v. [echo, n.] I. intrans. 1. To emit an echo; reflect or repeat sound; give forth an answering sound by or as if by echo.

And kiss'd her lips with such a clamorous smack,
That, at the parting, all the church did echo.
Shak., T. of the S., III. 2.

Lord, as I am, I have no power at all,
To hear thy voice, or echo to thy call.
Quarles, Emblems, iv. 8.

How often from the steep
Of echoing hill or thicket have we heard Celestial voices.
Milton, P. L., iv. 681.

2. To be reflected or repeated by or as if by echo; return or be conveyed to the ear in repetition; pass along by reverberation.

Her mistral princes hear the echoing noise,
And, Abdon, dread thy wrath and awful voice.
Sir R. Blackmore.

Sounds which echo further west
Than your sire's "Islands of the Blest."
Byron, Don Juan, III. 80.

In the midst of echoing and re-echoing voices of thanks giving.
D. Webster, Adams and Jefferson.

3. To produce a reverberating sound; give out a loud sound.

Drums and trumpets echo loudly,
Wave the crimson banners proudly.
Longfellow, The Black Knight (trans.).

II. trans. 1. To emit an echo of; reflect the sound of, either directly or obliquely; cause to be heard by reverberation: as, the whispering gallery of St. Paul's in London echoes very faint sounds.

Never [more shall] the black and dripping precipices Echo her stormy scream as she calls by.
M. Arnold, Sohrab and Rustum.

2. To repeat as if by way of echo; emit a reproduction of, as sounds, words, or sentiments; imitate the sound or significance of.

Then gan triumphant Trompets sound on bye,
That sent to heaven the echoed report
Of their new joy, and happy victory.
Spenser, F. Q., I. xii. 4.

Those peaks are echoed by the Trojan throng.
Dryden, Æneid.

The whole nation was echoing his name, and crowded theatres were applauding his wit and humour.
I. D'Israeli, Calais, of Authors, I. 146.

They would have echoed the praises of the men whom they envied, and then have sent to the newspapers libels upon them.

3. To imitate as an echo; repeat or reproduce the sounds, utterances, or sentiments of: as, the mocking-bird echoes nearly all other creatures; to echo a popular author.

And the true art for . . . popular display is—to contrive the best forms for appearing to say something new, when in reality you are but echoing yourself.

De Quincey, Style, I.

echoer (ek'ō-ēr), n. One who echoes.

Followers and echoers of other men.
W. Howitt, Visits to Remarkable Places (Amer. ed., 1865), p. 121.

echoic (ek'ō-ik), a. [= Sp. ecóico = Pg. ecoico; < L. echoticus, echoing, riming (of verses), < L. echo, echo: see echo.] Pertaining to or formed by echoism; onomatopoeic. See extract under echoism.

echoical (ē-kō'i-kal), a. [echoic + -al.] Having the nature of an echo. Nares. [Rare.]

An echoical verse, wherein the sound of the last syllable doth agree with the last save one, as in an echo.

echoism (ek'ō-izm), n. [echo + -ism.] In philol., the formation of words by the echoing or imitation of natural sounds, as those caused by the motion of objects, as buzz, whizz, or the characteristic cries of animals, as cuckoo, chickadee, whip-poor-will, etc.; onomatopoeia. [Recent.]

Onomatopoeia, in addition to its awkwardness, has neither associative nor etymological application to words imitating sounds. It means word-making or word-coining, and is as strictly applicable to Comte's admiratus as to cuckoo. Echoism suggests the echoing of a sound heard, and has the useful derivatives echoist, echoize, and echoic. Instead of onomatopoeic, which is not only unmanageable, but, when applied to words like cuckoo, crack, erroneous; it is the voice of the cuckoo, the sharp sound of breaking, which is onomatopoeic or word-creating, not the echoic words which they create.

J. A. H. Murray, 9th Ann. Address to Philol. Soc.

echoist (ek'ō-ist), n. [echo + -ist.] One who forms words by the imitation or echoing of sounds. See echoism. [Recent.]

echoize (ek'ō-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. echoized, pp. echoizing. [echo + -ize.] To form words by echoing or imitating sounds. See echoism. [Recent.]

echolalia (ek-ō-lā-li-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ēxē, an echo, & lalia, babbling, < lalia, babble.] In pathol., the repetition by the patient in a meaningless way of words and phrases addressed to him. It occurs in certain nervous disorders.

echoless (ek'ō-less), a. [echo + -less.] Giving or yielding no echo; calling forth no response.

Its voice is echoless.
Byron, Prometheus.

echometer (ē-kōm'e-tēr), n. [= F. écomètre = Sp. ecómetro = Pg. ecómetro = It. ecometro, < Gr. ēxē, echo, & μτρον, a measure.] In physics, an instrument for measuring the duration, the intervals, and the mutual relation of sounds.

echometry (ē-kōm'e-tri), n. [= F. écométrie = Sp. ecometría = Pg. ecometría = It. ecometria; as echometer + -y.] 1. The art or act of measuring the duration, etc., of sounds.—2. In arch., the art of constructing buildings in conformity with the principles of acoustics.

echoscope (ek'ō-skōp), n. [echo, & σκοπεῖν, view.] A stethoscope.

echo-stop (ek'ō-stop), n. See echo, 4.

Echymys, n. An erroneous form of Echimus. Hiegmans, 1838.

Eciton (es'i-ton), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1804); formation not obvious.] A genus of ants called Eciton dringiphorum. a, soldier (lives shows natural size); c, head of male, front view.

Ant or army ants, usually placed in the family Myrmecidae, as the petiole of the abdomen has two nodes. It is now supposed that the genus Lehmannia, of the family Dorylidae, is represented exclusively by the males of Eciton, and the characters of both groups require revision. These ants are found in South and Central America, and a species of Eciton and 6 of Lehmannia are known in the United States, from Utah, New Mexico, California, and Texas. There are two kinds of nesters or workers, large-headed and small-headed, the former of which are called soldiers. They are carnivorous, march in vast numbers, and are very destructive.

ecclie (ek'le), n. [E. dial., also ecle, var. of ecle, ult. < AE. gicol, an icicle: see icicle, icicle.] 1. An icicle. — 2. pl. The crest of a cock. — To build ecclies in the air, to build castles in the air. [Prov. Eng.]

ecclie (ek'le), n. [E. dial. Cf. ecle.] A woodpecker. [Prov. Eng.]

ecclie, v. i.; pret. and pp. ecclied, ppr. eccling. [A dial. var. of ecle.] To aim; intend; design. [Halliwell. North. Eng.]

éclair (â-kîr'), n. [F., lit. lightning, < éclairer, lighten, illumine, < L. exclarare, light up, < ex, out, + clarare, make bright or clear: see clear, v.] A small oblong cake, filled with a cream or custard, and glazed with chocolate or sugar.

claircise, v. t. See claircise.

claircissement (â-kîr-sô-môn), n. [F. (= Pr. claircissement = Sp. clarificación = Pg. clarificação) < claircir, clear up: see claircise.] Explanation; the clearing up of something not before understood.

Nay, madam, you shall stay . . . till he has made an claircissement of his love to you. [Bycherley, Country Wife.]

Next morning I breakfasted alone with Mr. Walspole, when we had all the claircissement I ever expected, and I left him far better satisfied than I had been hitherto. [Gray, Letters, I. 124.]

claircise (â-kîr-sîz), v. t.; pret. and pp. claircized, ppr. claircizing. [F. éclaircir, stem of certain parts of claircir = Pr. clarciar, clarciar = Sp. Pg. clarciar, clear up; with suffix, ult. < L. -escere (see -esc-, -ish), < clairer, lighten, illumine: see clair.] To make clear; explain; clear up, as something not understood or misunderstood. Also spelled claircise. [Rare.]

clampsia (ek-lamp'si-â), n. [= F. clampsie = It. clampsia, < NL. clampsia, < Gr. κλᾶμψη, a shining forth, exceeding brightness, < κλαμψω, shine forth, < κλ, forth, + ψω, shine: see lamp.] In pathol., a flashing of light before the eyes; also, rapid convulsive motions. The name is applied to convulsions resembling those of epilepsy, but not of true epilepsy: as, the clampsia of childbirth. Also clampsy.

clampsic (ek-lamp'sik), a. A less correct form of clampsia.

clampsy (ek-lamp'si), n. Same as clampsia.

clamptic (ek-lamp'tik), a. [= F. clamptique; as clampsia (clampt-) + -ic.] 1. Pertaining to or of the nature of clampsia: as, clamptic convulsions; clamptic idiosyncrasy. — 2. Suffering from clampsia: as, an clamptic patient.

clat (â-kîr'), n. [F., < clater, burst forth, < OF. clater, shine, < clater, burst, < OHG. slizan, MHG. slizen, split, burst, G. schleimen = AS. slîman, E. slit, q. v.] 1. A burst, as of applause; acclamation; approbation: as, his speech was received with great clat. — 2. Brilliant effect; brilliancy of success; splendor; magnificence: as, the clat of a great achievement.

Although we have taken formal possession of Burmah with much clat, the dangers and difficulties of the enterprise are by no means at an end. [Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XXXIX. 288.]

S. Renown; glory.

Yet the clat it gave was enough to turn the head of a man less presumptuous than Egmont. [Prescott.]

electic (ek-lek'tik), a. and n. [= F. électique = Sp. electico = Pg. electico = It. elettico (cf. G. elektisch = Dan. elektisk), < NL. electicus, < Gr. ἐλεκτικός, picking out, selecting, < ἐλέγω, picked out, < ἐλέγγω, pick out (= L. eligere, pp. electus, > E. elect, q. v.), < ex, out, + λέγω, pick, choose: see legend.] 1. a. Selecting; choosing; not confined to or following any one model or system, but selecting and appropriating whatever is considered best in all.

The American mind, in the largest sense electic, struggled for universality, while it asserted freedom. [Bancroft, Hist. U. S., II. 404.]

When not creative, their genius has been electic and refining. [Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 25.]

Electic medicine, a medical theory and practice based upon selection of what is esteemed best in all systems; specifically, the medical systems of a separately organized school of physicians in the United States, who make much use of what they regard as specific remedies, largely or chiefly botanical. — Electic physician. (a) One of an ancient order of physicians, supposed to have been founded by Agathinus of Sparta. (b) A practitioner of the American school of electic medicine.

II. n. One who, in whatever department of knowledge, not being convinced of the fundamental principles of any existing system, culls from the teachings of different schools such doctrines as seem to him probably true, conformable to good sense, wholesome in practice, or recommended by other secondary considerations; one who holds that opposing schools are right in their distinctive doctrines, wrong only in their opposition to one another. In philosophy the chief groups of electics have been: (1) those ancient writers, from the first century before Christ, who, like Cicero, influenced by Platonic skepticism, held a composite doctrine of ethics, logic, etc., aggregated of Platonist, Peripatetic, Stoic, and even Epicurean elements; (2) writers in the seventeenth century who, like Leibnitz, mingled Aristotelian and Cartesian principles; (3) writers in the eighteenth century who adopted in part the views of Leibnitz, in part those of Locke; (4) Schelling and others, who held beliefs derived from various idealistic, pantheistic, and mystical philosophies; (5) the school of Cousin, who took a mean position between a philosophy of experience and one of absolute reason.

Even the electic, who arose about the age of Augustus, . . . were . . . as slavish and dependent as any of their brethren, since they sought for truth not in nature, but in the several schools. [Hume, Rise of Arts and Sciences.]

My notion of an electic is a man who, without foregoing conclusions of any sort, deliberately surveys all accessible modes of thought, and chooses from each his own "hottest siccus" of definitive convictions. [J. Owen, Evenings with Skeptics, II. 231.]

Specifically — (a) A follower of the ancient electic philosophy. (b) In the early church, a Christian who believed the doctrine of Plato to be conformable to the spirit of the gospel. (c) In med., a practitioner of electic medicine, either ancient or modern. — an electic physician.

electically (ek-lek'ti-kul-i), adv. By way of choosing or selecting; in the manner of the electic philosophers or physicians; as an electic.

electicism (ek-lek'ti-sizm), n. [= F. électicisme; as electic + -ism.] The method of the electics, or a system, as of philosophy, medicine, etc., made up of selections from various systems.

Sensualism, idealism, skepticism, mysticism, are all partial and exclusive views of the elements of intelligence. But each is false only as it is incomplete. They are all true in what they affirm, all erroneous in what they deny. Though hitherto opposed, they are, consequently, not incapable of coalition; and, in fact, can only obtain their consummation in a powerful electicism — a system which shall comprehend them all. [Sir W. Hamilton, Edinburgh Rev., I. 201.]

electism (ek-lek'tizm), n. [Cf. F. électisme = Pg. electismo, < Gr. ἐλεκτισμός, picked out: see electic and -ism.] Same as electicism. [Rare.]

The characterists, indeed, argue for that electicism of taste which finds suggestive material wherever there is force and beauty. [D. G. Mitchell, Bound Together, iv.]

Electus (ek-lek'tus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐλεκτός, picked out, select: see electic.] 1. A genus of trichoglossine parrots related to the lorikee, containing several species of the Philippine, Malacca, and Papuan islands, as E. lunatus, E. polychlorus, etc. — 2. [l. c.] A parrot of the genus Electus.

eclegm (ek-lek'm), n. [Prop. eclygm*; = F. eclygme, eclygme, < L. eclygma, < Gr. ἐκλῆγμα, an electuary, < ἐλέγω, lick up, < ex, out, + λέγω, lick. Cf. electuary, from the same ult. source.] A medicine of syrupy consistency.

eclimeter (ek-lim'e-ter), n. An instrument to be held in the hand for measuring the zenith distances of objects near the horizon.

ecclipse (â-klip's), n. [Cf. ME. eclyps (more frequent in the abbr. form clips, clippus, clippus, etc.: see clips), < OF. eclyps, F. eclyps = Pr. eclyps, eclyps, clips = Sp. Pg. eclyps = It. eclyps, eclyps, eclyps, < L. eclypsis, < Gr. ἐκλῆψις, an eclipse, lit. a falling, forsaking, < ἐκλείπω, leave out, pass over, forsake, fail, intr. leave off, cease, suffer an eclipse, < ex, out, + λείπω, leave.] 1. In astron., an interception or obscuration of the light of the sun, moon, or other heavenly body, by the intervention of another heavenly body either between it and the eye or between it and the source of its illumination. An eclipse of the sun is caused by the intervention of the moon between it and the earth, the sun's disk being thus partially or entirely hidden; an eclipse of the moon is occasioned by the earth passing between it and the sun, the earth's shadow obscuring the whole or part of its surface, but never entirely concealing it. The number of eclipses of the sun and moon cannot be fewer than two nor more than seven in one year, exclusive of penumbral eclipses of the moon. The most usual number is four, seven being very rare. Jupiter's satellites are eclipsed by passing through his shadow. See occultation.

For it shall change wonder soon,
And take eclipse right as the moon,
Whence he is from us lost
Thurgh ether, that hitwise to sett
The some and hir, as it may falle,
Be it in partle or in alle. [Rons. of the Rose, l. 537.]

But in y^e first watche of y^e night, the moone suffered eclipse. [J. Brewe, tr. of Quintus Curtius, fol. 78.]

The sun . . . from behind the moon,
In dim eclipse, disastrous twilight sheds
On half the nation, or with fear of change Perplexes monarchs. [Milton, P. L., l. 597.]

As when the sun, a crescent of eclipse, Dreams over lake and lawn, and tales and capes. [Tennyson, Vision of Sin, l. 1.]

2. Figuratively, any state of obscurity; an overshadowing; a transition from brightness, clearness, or animation to the opposite state: as, his glory has suffered an ecclipse.

All the posterity of our first parents suffered a perpetual ecclipse of spiritual life. [Ratcliff, Hist. World.]

Claydy without eclipse Wealth me. [Tennyson, Lillan.]

How like the starless night of death
Our being's brief ecclipse.
When faltering heart and failing breath
Have leached the fading lips! [O. W. Holmes, Agnes.]

He [Karl Hakon] was sometimes, in season and out of season, to bring back those who in that ecclipse of the old faith had either gone over to Christianity or preferred to "trust in themselves," to what he considered the true faith. [Kilburg Rev.]

Annular, central, partial, penumbral, total eclipses. See the adjectives. — Eclipse of a satellite, the obscuration of it by the shadow of its primary: opposed to an occultation, in which it is hidden by the body of the primary. — Eclipse of Thales, a total eclipse of the sun which took place 626 B. C., May 28th, during a battle between the Medes and the Lydians, and which is stated to have been predicted by Thales of Miletus. — Quantity of an eclipse, the number of digits eclipsed. See digit, s.

ecclipse (â-klip's), v. t.; pret. and pp. ecclipsed, ppr. ecclipsing. [Cf. ME. eclypsen, < OF. eclypsier, F. eclypsier = Pr. Sp. Pg. eclypsar = It. ecclipsare, ecclipsare; from the ecclips.] 1. trans. 1. To obscure by an eclipse; cause the obscuration of; darken or hide, as a heavenly body: as, the moon ecclipses the sun.

Within these two hundred years found out it was . . . that the moon sometime was ecclipsed twice in five moneths space, and the sunne likewise in seven. [Holland, tr. of Pliny, II. 9.]

2. To overshadow; throw in the shade; obscure; hence, to surpass or excel.

Though you have all this worth, you hold some qualities that do ecclipse your virtues. [Bacon, and Pl., King and No King, l. 1.]

Another now hath to himself engross'd
All power, and us ecclipsed. [Milton, P. L., v. 776.]

When he [Christ] was lifted up (to his cross), he did there crucify the world, and the things of it, ecclipse the lustre, and destroy the power, of all its empty vanities. [Sp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. xviii.]

I, therefore, for the moment, omit all inquiry how far the Mariology of the early Church did indeed ecclipse Christ. [Ruskin.]

II. intrans. To suffer an eclipse. [Rare.]

The labouring moon
Ecclipses at their charms. [Milton, P. L., II. 466.]

eclyptic (â-klip'tik), a. and n. [Formerly eclyptick; = F. écliptique = Pg. eclyptico = It. eclettica, < L. eclypticus, < LGr. ἐκλειπτικός, of or caused by an eclipse (as a noun, = F. écliptique = Sp. eclyptica = Pg. eclyptica = It. eclettica, < L. eclyptica (no. linea, linea), < Gr. ἐκλείπτω (see ἐκλῆψις, circle), the line or circle in the plane of which eclipses take place), < ἐκλείπω, an eclipse: see ecclipse, n.] 1. a. 1. Pertaining to an eclipse. — 2. Pertaining to the apparent path of the sun in the heavens: as, eclyptic constellations.

Thy full face in his oblique designs
Confronting Phoebus in the Eclyptic line,
And th' Earth between. [Hyllester, tr. of Du Barlaam's Weeks, l. 4.]

Eclyptic conjunction, a conjunction in longitude of the moon with the sun, the former being within its eclyptic limits. — Eclyptic digit, one twelfth part of the sun's or moon's diameter, used as a unit in expressing the quantity of eclipses. — Eclyptic limits, the greatest distances at which the moon can be from her nodes (that is, from the eclyptic), if an eclipse of the sun or moon is to happen.

II. n. 1. In astron., a great circle of the heavens in the plane of the earth's orbit, or that of the apparent annual motion of the sun among the stars. The fixed eclyptic is the position of the eclyptic at any given date. The mean eclyptic is the position of the fixed eclyptic relative to the equinoctial, as modified by precession. This is now approaching the equinoctial at the rate of 47" per century. The true or apparent eclyptic is the mean eclyptic as modified by the effects of nutation. The obliquity of the eclyptic is the inclination of the ecliptic to the equinoctial. Its mean value for A. D. 1900 is 23° 27' 8".

Satan . . .
Took leave; and toward the coast of earth beneath, Down from the ecliptic sped. Milton, P. L., III, 740.

My lady's Indian kumman, unannounced,
With half a score of swarthy faces came.
His own, tho' keen and bold and soldierly,
Seated by the clone ecliptic, was not far.
Tennyson, Aylmer's Field

2. A great circle drawn upon a terrestrial globe, tangent to the tropics. It is sometimes said to "mark the sun's annual path across the surface of the earth"; but since its plane is represented as fixed upon the earth, the rotation of the latter will give it a gyratory motion incompatible with its representing any celestial appearance. It may, however, prove convenient when a terrestrial globe is used instead of a celestial one.

eclog, n. An abbreviated spelling of eclogue.

eclogite (ek'log-jit), n. [Gr. ἐκλογή, picked out (ἐκ ἐκλογέω, pick out, choose), + -itē.] The name given by Huidy to a rock consisting of a crystalline-granular aggregate of omphacite (a granular, grass-green variety of pyroxene) with red garnet. With these essential constituents cyanite (glaucophane) is often associated, and, less commonly, silvery mica, quartz, and pyrites. This is one of the most beautiful of rocks, and of rather rare occurrence. It is found in the Alps, in the Fichtelgebirge in Bavaria, in the Erzgebirge in Bohemia, and also in Norway. It occurs in lenticular masses in the older gneisses and schists. To the variety occurring at Syria in Greece, consisting largely of cyanite or glaucophane, the name eclogite rock or glaucophane rock has been given. Also spelled eclogite.

eclogue (ek'log), n. [Early mod. E. also eclog, and eclogue, eclogue; = F. eclogue, eclogue, now éclouque, éclogue = Sp. ecloga = Pg. ecloga = It. ecloga, ecloga = G. ecloga = Dan. Sw. ecloga, ecloga, ecloga, ecloga, a selection, esp. of poems, "elegant extracts" (cf. ἐκλογή, picked out), ἐκλογέω, pick out, select, ἐκ, out, + λέγω, pick, choose; cf. eclectic.] The term came to be applied esp. to a collection of pastoral poems (with special ref. to Virgil's pastoral poems (Bucolica), which were published under the title of Eclogæ, "selectious"), whence the false spellings eclogue, eclogue (F. éclogue, etc.), in an endeavor to bring in the pastoral associations of (Fr. ais (ais), a goat.) In poetry, a pastoral composition, in which shepherds are introduced conversing with one another; a bucolic: as, the eclogues of Virgil.

Some be of opinion, and the chiefe of those who have written in this Art among the Latines, that the pastoral Poeme which we commonly call by the name of Eclouque and Bucolicke, a term brought in by the Sicilian Poets, should be the first of any other.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 30.

eclosion (ē-kloz'zhon), n. [F. éclosion, éclosion, stem of certain parts of éclore, emerge from the egg, éclore, éclore, shut out; see ecclude, ecclusion, and cf. *close*¹, *close*².] The act of emerging from a covering or concealment; specifically, in insects, the escape of an insect from the pupa- or chrysalis-case.

eclysis (ek'li-sis), n. [Gr. ἐκλύσις, a lowering of the voice through three quarter-tones, a release or deliverance, ἐκλύω, release, ἐκ, out, + λύω, loose.] In Gr. music, the lowering or flattening of a tone, opposed to ecbole.

ecod (ē-kod'), interj. [One of the numerous variations, as egad, begad, bedad, etc., of the oath by God.] By God; egad; a minced oath. [Now rare.]

Ecod, you're in the right of it.

Sheridan (?), The Camp, I, 1.

Ecod! how the wind blows! S. Judd, Margaret, I, 14.

ecology, n. See ecology.

econome (ek'ō-nōm), n. [= F. économe = Sp. economo = Pg. It. economo, steward, financial manager, = D. econoom = G. ökonom, husbandman, steward, = Dan. ökonom = Sw. ekonom (D. and Sw. after F.), ökonomus, ökonomus, a housekeeper: see economy.] 1. In the early church, a diocesan administrator; the curator, administrator, and dispenser, under the bishop, of the diocesan property and revenues.—2. In the early and in the medieval church, and to the present day in the Greek Church, the financial officer and steward of a monastery.

Also œconome and œconomus.

economic (ē-kō- or ek'ō-nom'ik), a. [Formerly also œconomick, œconomic, œconomick, œconomique; = F. économique = Sp. económico = Pg. It. economico (cf. D. ökonomisch = G. ökonomisch = Dan. ökonomisk = Sw. ekonomisk), ökonomikus, ökonomikus, pertaining to the management of a household or family, practised therein, frugal, thrifty, οἰκονομία, the management of a household: see economy.] 1. Relating or pertaining to the household; domestic.—2. Pertaining to the regulation of household concerns. [Obsolete or archaic.]

And doth employ her economic art,
And busy care, her household to preserve.
Sir J. Davies, Immortal of Soul.

3. Pertaining to pecuniary means or concerns; relating to or connected with income and expenditure: as, his economic management was bad; he was restrained by economic considerations; the economic branches of government.

—4. Of or pertaining to economics, or the production, distribution, and use of wealth; relating to the means of living, or to the arts by which human needs and comforts are supplied: as, an economic problem; economic disturbances; economic geology or botany.

The economic ruin of Spain may be said to date from the expulsion of the Moriscos.

J. Fiske, Evolutionist, p. 243.

5. Characterized by freedom from wastefulness, extravagance, or excess; frugal; saving; sparing: as, economic use of money or of material. [In this sense more commonly economical.]

The charitable few are chiefly they Whom Fortune places in the middle way;
Just rich enough, with economic care,
To save a pittance, and a pittance spare.

Harte, Eulogium.

= Syn. 5. Saving, sparing, careful, thrifty, provident.

economic (ē-kō- or ek'ō-nom'ik), a. [economic + -al.] Same as economic. The form economical is more common than economic in use.

This economical misfortune [of ill assorted matrimony].
Milton, Divorce.

There was no economical distress in England to prompt the enterprises of colonization.
Palfrey.

But the economical and moral causes that were destroying agriculture in Italy were too strong to be resisted.
Lecky, Europ. Morals, I, 284.

The life of the well off people is graceful, pretty, daintily ordered, hospitable; but it has a simplicity which incidentally makes it comparatively economical.
Arch. Forbes, Souvenirs of some Continents, p. 68.

economically (ē-kō- or ek'ō-nom'ik-ly), adv.

1. As regards the production, distribution, and use of wealth; as regards the means by which human needs and comforts are supplied.—2. With economy; with frugality or moderation.

economics (ē-kō- or ek'ō-nom'iks), n. [Formerly also œconomicks; pl. of œconomick (see -ics), after Gr. τὰ οἰκονομικά, neut. pl. (also fem. sing. οἰκονομική, see τμήν, art), the art of household management.] 1. The science of household or domestic management. [Obsolete or archaic.]—2. The science which treats of wealth, its production, distribution, etc.: political economy.

The best authors have chosen rather to handle it [education] in their politics than in their œconomicks.

Sir H. Wotton, Reliquie, p. 78.

Not only in science, but in politics and economics, in the less splendid arts which administer to convenience and enjoyment, much information may be derived, by careful search, from times which have been in general neglected, as affording nothing to repay the labour of attention.

F. Knor, Essays, No. 73.

Among minor alterations, I may mention the substitution for the name of Political Economy of the single convenient term Economics.
Jenns, Pol. Econ. (3d ed.), Pref.

economisation, economise, etc. See economisation, etc.

economist (ē-kō-nō-mist), n. [Formerly also œconomist; = F. économiste = Sp. Pg. It. economista; as economy + -ist.] 1. One who manages pecuniary or other resources: a manager in general, with reference to means and expenditure or outlay.

Very few people are good œconomists of their fortune, and still fewer of their time. Chesterfield, Letters, ccxvi.

It would be . . . madness to expect happiness from one who has been so very bad an œconomist of his own.
Goldsmith, Vicar, xii.

Ferdinand was too severe an œconomist of time to waste it willingly on idle pomp and ceremonial.
Forrest, Edw. and Isa., II, 13.

Specifically.—2. A careful or prudent manager of pecuniary means; one who practises frugality in expenditure: as, he has the reputation of being an œconomist; he is a rigid œconomist.—3. One versed in economics, or the science of political economy.

So well known an English œconomist as Malthus has also shown in a few lines his complete appreciation of the mathematical nature of economic questions.
Jenns, Pol. Econ. (3d ed.), Pref.

4. An officer in some cathedrals of the Church of Ireland who is appointed by the chapter to manage the cathedral fund, to see to the necessary repairs, pay the church officers, etc.—Economist mouse, Arvicola œconomus, a Siberian vole.

Faun. He keeps open house for all comers.

Wid. He ought to be very rich, whose economy is so profuse.
Mrs. Centlivre, The Artifice, iv.

Hence.—2. A frugal and judicious use of money, material, time, etc.; the avoidance of or freedom from waste or extravagance in the management or use of anything; frugality in the expenditure or consumption of money, materials, etc.

I have no other notion of economy than that it is the parent of liberty and ease. Swift, to Lord Bolingbroke.

Nature, with a perfect economy, uses all forces to account.
H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 228.

Another principle that serves to throw light on our inquiry is that which has been called the principle of economy, viz., that an effect is pleasing in proportion as it is attained by little effort and simple means.

J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX, 70.

3. Management, order, or arrangement in general; the disposition or regulation of the parts or functions of any organic whole; an organized system or method: as, the internal economy of a nation; the economy of the work is out of joint.

This economy must be observed in the minutest parts of an epic poem.
Dryden, Æneid, Ded.

If we rightly examine things, we shall find that there is a sort of economy in providence, that she shall excel where another is defective, in order to make men more useful to each other, and mix them in society.

Steele, Tatler, No. 92.

Specifically.—(a) The provisions of nature for the generation, nutrition, and preservation of animals and plants; the regular, harmonious system in accordance with which the functions of living animals and plants are performed: as, the animal economy; the vegetable economy.

He with faints

Or harms them there is guilty of a wrong,
Disturbs the economy of nature's realm.

Cowper, Task, vi, 571.

If we forget, for an instant, that each species tends to increase indefinitely, and that some check is always in action, yet seldom perceived by us, the whole economy of Nature will be utterly obscured.

Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 32.

(b) The functional organization of a living body; as, his internal economy is badly damaged.

It is necessary to banish from the mind the idea that we live literally besieged by organisms always ready to sow subjection on the unoccupied tract of our economies.

Science, III. 520.

(c) The regulation and disposition of the internal affairs of a state or nation, or of any department of government.

The Jews already had a Sabbath, which as citizens and subjects of that economy they were obliged to keep, and did keep.

Paley.

The theatre was by no means so essential a part of the economy of a Roman city as it was of a Grecian one.

J. Ferguson, Hist. Arch., I. 323.

4. Management; control. [Rare.]

I shall never recompense my Features, to receive Sir Rowland with any (Economy of Face.

Congress, Way of the World, III. 5.

Domestic economy. See Domestic.—Economy of grace. See Grace.—Political economy. See Political.—Syn. 2. Frugality, Economy, Thrift. Frugality saves by avoiding both waste and needless expense; its central idea is that of saving. Economy goes further, and includes prudent management; an economy of time. Thrift is a stronger word for economy; it is a smart, ambitious, and successful pecuniary.

Lucullus, when frugality could charm,

Had roasted turnips in the Sabine farm.

Pope, Moral Essays, I. 218.

Strict economy enabled him (Frederic William) to keep up a peace establishment of sixty thousand troops.

Munday, Frederic the Great.

Thrift, thrift, Horatio! the funeral baid meals

Did coldly furnish forth the marriage tables.

Shak., Hamlet, I. 2.

e converso (ē kon-vēr'sō), n. [L., lit. from the converse: e, ex, from; converso, abl. of conversum, neut. of convertere, converse: see conversus 2, a.] On the contrary; on the other hand.

ēcorticate (ē-kōr'ti-kāt), a. [NL., ēcorticatus*, < L. e- priv. + cortex (cortic-), bark: see cortice.] In bot., without a cortical layer: applied especially to lichens.

Écossaise (ā-kō-sāz'), n. [F., fem. of Écossais, Scotch: see Scotch.] 1. A species of rustic dance of Scotch origin.—2. Music written for such a dance, or in imitation of its rhythm.—3. In therapeutics, the douche Écossaise or Scotch douche, alternating hot and cold douches.

The alternation of hot and cold douches, which for some unknown reason has got the name of Écossaise, is a very powerful remedy from the strong action and reaction which it produces, and is one of very great value.

Encyc. Brit., III. 430.

ecostate (ē-kōs'tāt), a. [NL., ecostatus, < L. e- priv. + costa, a rib: see costate.] 1. In bot., not ecostate; without ribs.—2. In zool.: (a) Having no costae, in general; ribless. (b) Bearing no ribs, as a vertebra.

écoute (ā-kōt'), n. [F., < écouter, OF. ēscouter, listen, > ult. E. scout.] In fort., a small gallery made in front of the glacis for the shelter of troops, designed to annoy or interrupt the miners of the enemy.

Epantheria (ēk-pān-thē'rī-ā), n. [NL. (Hübner, 1816), so called as being spotted, < Gr. ēk, out (here intensive), + panthēr, panther or leopard: see panther.] A genus of arctid moths chiefly distinguished by the short hind wings, and comprising a large number of new-world species. Most of them are tropical or subtropical, but E. scribonia is a well-known North American form.

ephasis (ēk'fā-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ēphāsīs, a declaration, < ēphēmi, speak out, < ēk, out, + phēmi = L. fari, speak.] In rhet., an explicit declaration.

Ephimotes, n. See Ephymotes.

epiphysis (ēk'fī-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. as if ēk-phēsis*, < ēkphēmi, spurt out, < ēk, out, + phēmi, bubble up, burst out.] In pathol., vesicular eruption, confined in its action to the surface.

epiphonema (ēk'fō-nō'mā), n. [NL., < Gr. ēkphōnēma, a thing called out, a sermon, < ēkphōnēmi, cry out, pronounce, < ēk, out, + phōnēmi, utter a sound, < phōnē, the voice, a sound.] A rhetorical exclamation or ejaculation. See epiphonema.

epiphoneme (ēk'fō-nēm), n. [NL., < Gr. ēkphōnēma: see epiphonema.] The mark of exclamation (!). Gold Brown.

epiphoniasis (ēk'fō-nō'sis), n.; pl. epiphoniasis (-ās). [NL., < Gr. ēkphōnēsis, pronunciation, an exclamation, < ēkphōnēmi, pronounce, cry out: see epiphonema.] 1. In rhet., a figure which consists in the use of an exclamation, question, or other form of words used interjectionally to express some sudden emotion, such as joy, sorrow, fear, wonder, indignation, anger, or impatience. Also called exclamation.—2. In the Or. (h., one of those parts of the service which are said by the priest or officiant in an audible or elevated voice. The greater part of the liturgy is said secretly—that is, in a low or inaudible tone (whisper), an adverb equivalent to the secrete or secreto of the Latin Church). The ephoniasis, on the other hand, are said aloud (ēphōnēsi, an adverb answering to the phrases intelligibili voce, clara voce, of the Roman Missal), with an audible voice, with a loud voice, in the English Prayer Book). They generally form the conclusion of a prayer which the priest has said secretly, and contain a doxology or ascription to the Trinity. The benediction at the beginning of the liturgy of the Catechumens and that at the commencement of the Anaphora in the Constantinopolitan liturgies are said in this way. Also called the exclamation.

epiphora (ēk'fō-rā), n. [NL., < Gr. ēpiporā, a carrying out, a projection in a building, < ēpiporēmi, carry out, intr. shoot forth, < ēk, out, + phōrēmi = E. bear.] 1. In arch., the projection of any member or molding before the face of the member or molding next below it.—2. [cap.] In conch., same as Fusus. Conrad, 1843.

epiphractic (ēk-frak'tik), a. and n. [NL., < Gr. ēpiphraktikos, fit for clearing obstructions (ēpiphraktēs, se. phōnēsis, pl., epiphractic medicines), < ēpiphraktēs, clear obstructions, open up, < ēk, out, + phōnēsi, inclose.] 1. a. In med., serving to remove obstructions; deobstruent.

II. n. An epiphractic drug.

epiphronia (ēk-frō-nī-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ēpiphrōnē, out of one's mind, crazy, < ēk, out of, + phōnēmi, mind.] In pathol., insanity.

epiphyma (ēk-fī-mī-ā), n.; pl. epiphymata (ēk-fī-mā-tā). [NL., < Gr. ēpiphyma, an eruption of pimples, < ēpiphymēmi, grow out, < ēk, out, + phōnēmi, grow.] In pathol., a cutaneous excrescence, as a wart.

Ephymotes (ēk-fī-mō'tēz), n. [NL., < Gr. ēpiphymōtes, an eruption of pimples: see epiphyma.] A genus of pleurodont lizards, of the family Iguanida, having a short and flattened form, and large pointed carinate scales on the thick tail: otherwise generally as in Polychrus. Fitzinger, 1826. Also spelled Ephymotes.

epiphysis (ēk-fī-zē-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ēpiphysis, emission of the breath, < ēpiphysi, blow out, breathe out, snort, < ēk, out, + phōnēmi, blow, breathe.] In pathol., a quick breathing.

Epleopodidæ (ēk-plē-opōd'idē), n. pl. [NL., < Epleopus + -idæ.] A family of phylopleural or cycloaurum lizards. Also Epleopoda.

Epleopus (ēk-plē-o-pus), n. [NL., < Gr. ēpleopus, complete, entire, < ēk, out, + pleō, full, + pus = E. foot.] The typical genus of the family Epleopodidæ. Duméril and Bibron.

ectopoma (ēk-tō-mā), n. [NL., < Gr. ēktopoma, a dislocation, < ēktopōmi, full out of, be dislocated, < ēk, out, + topōmi, fall.] In pathol., a falling down of any part: applied to luxations, prolapsus uteri, scrotal hernia, the expulsion of the placenta, sloughing off of gangrenous parts, etc.

ecpyresis (ēk-pī-rē-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ēkpyresis, suppuration, < ēkpyrēmi, suppurate, < ēk, out, + pyrēmi, suppurate, < pyrē, pus.] In pathol., a skin-disease with purulent or serous effusion: now rarely used.

écrasement (ā-kraz'mōn), n. [F. écrasement, a crushing, < écraser, crush: see crase.] In surg., the operation of removing a part, as a tumor, by a wire or chain loop gradually tightened so as to cut slowly through its attachment.

écraseur (ā-kraz-zēr'), n. [F., < écraser, crush, bruise: see crase.] In surg., an instrument for removing tumors. It consists of a fine chain or wire which is passed around the base of the part to be removed, and gradually tightened by a screw or otherwise until it has cut through. Galvanic écraseur, an écraseur so constructed that the wire loop can be heated to redness while in use by the passage through it of an electric current.

écrevisse (ā-kre-vēs'), n. [F. écrevisse, a crawfish, a crayfish: see crawfish, crayfish.] In armor, a name given to any piece formed of splints, one sliding over the other, in the manner of the tail of the crawfish. See garden-rose, great braggart (under braggart), and splint.

ecrhythmus (ēk-rith'mus), n. [NL., < Gr. ēk-rhythmus, out of time, < ēk, out, + rhythmos, time, rhythm: see rhythm.] In med., an irregular beating of the pulse.

écru (ē-kru'), F. pron. ā-kru', a. [F. écru, unbleached, raw, applied to linen, silk, etc., OF. escru, < es, here unmeaning, + crus, raw, crude, < L. crudus: see crude.] 1. Unbleached: applied to textile fabrics.—2. Having the color of raw silk, or of undyed and unbleached linen: hence, by extension, having any similar shade of neutral color, as the color of hemp or hempen cord.—Écru lace, a modern lace made with two kinds of braid, one plain and the other crinkled, and worked into large and prominent patterns, usually geometrical, with bars or bridges of thread. The term is derived from the common use of materials of ecru color.

ecrustaceous (ē-kru-si-tā'shi-us), a. [NL., ecrustaceus*, < L. e- priv. + crusta, a crust: see crustaceous.] In bot., without a crustaceous thallus, as some lichens.

ecstasis (ēk'stā-sis), n. [LL., < Gr. ēkstasy: see ecstasy.] In pathol., same as ecstasy, 3.

ecstasize (ēk'stā-siz), v. t.; pret. and pp. ecstasized, ppr. ecstasizing. [Ecstasy + -ize.] To fill with ecstasy or excessive joy. F. Butler. [Rare.]

Rose and Margaret burst from their retreat with a loud laugh, and gave Obed a hearty greeting; which he, bemused and ecstasized, returned as handsomely as he knew how.

S. Judd, Margaret, II. 11.

ecstasy (ēk'stā-si), n.; pl. ecstasies (-sīz). [Formerly spelled variously ecstasie, ecstasy, ecstasy, ecstasy, etc.; = F. extase = Sp. extasis, extasis = Pg. extasis = It. estasi (D. extase = G. ekstase = Dan. extase = Sw. extas, < F.). < L. ecstasy, ML. also extasis, < Gr. ēkstasy, any displacement or removal from the proper place, a standing aside, distraction of mind, astonishment, later a trance, < ēk, out, 2d. aor. ēkstatēmi, put or place aside, mid. and pass. stand aside, < ēk, out, + statēmi, place, set, intr. ēkstatēmi, stand: see stasis.] 1. A state in which the mind is exalted or liberated as it were from the body; a state in which the functions of the senses are suspended by the contemplation of some extraordinary or supernatural object, or by absorption in some overpowering idea, most frequently of a religious nature; entrancing rapture or transport.

Whether that we call ecstasy be not dreaming with our eyes open, I leave to be examined.

Locke.

When the mind is warmed with heavenly thoughts, and wrought up into some degree of holy ecstasy, it stays not there, but communicates these impressions to the body.

Sp. Atterbury, Sermone, II. xix.

The Neoplatonists, though they sometimes spoke of civic virtues, regarded the condition of ecstasy as not only transcending but including all, and that condition could only be arrived at by a passive life.

Locky, Europ. Morals, I. 260.

2. Overpowering emotion or exaltation, in which the mind is absorbed and the actions are controlled by the exciting subject; a sudden access of intense feeling. Specifically—(a) Joyful, delightful, or rapturous emotion; extravagant delight; as, the ecstasy of love; he gazed upon the scene with ecstasy.

He on the tender grass

Would sit, and hearken even to ecstasy.

Milton, Comus, I. 622.

Sweet thankful love his soul did fill

With utter ecstasy of bliss.

William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 84.

It is a sky of Italian April, full of sunshine and the hidden ecstasy of lakes.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 191.

The ecstasy of mirth and terror which his gestures and play of countenance never failed to produce in a nursery flattered him (Garrick) quite as much as the applause of mature critics.

Munday, Madame d'Arbury.

(b) Grief, or painful emotion; extreme agitation; distraction: as, the very ecstasy of grief, an ecstasy of fear.

Better be with the dead . . .

Than on the torture of the mind to lie

In restless ecstasy.

Shak., Macbeth, III. 2.

Come, let us leave him in his treful mood,

Our words will but increase his ecstasy.

Marlowe, John of Malta, I. 2.

And last, the cannon's voice that shook the skies,

And, as it fares in sudden ecstasy,

At once is felt in both of ears and eyes.

Dryden, Antony and Cleopatra, I. 322.

3. In med., a morbid state of the nervous system, allied to cataplexy and trance, in which the patient assumes the attitude and expression of rapture. Also extasis.—4. Insanity; madness.

That noble and most sovereign reason,

Like sweet bells jangled, out of tune and harsh;

That unmatch'd form and feature of blown youth,

Blasted with ecstasy.

Shak., Hamlet, III. 1.

ecstasy (ēk'stā-si), v. t.; pret. and pp. ecstasized, ppr. ecstasizing. [Ecstasy, n.] To fill with rapture or enthusiasm. [Rare.]

The persons . . . then made prophetic and inspired mut needs have discovered like seraphims and the most ecstasized order of intelligences.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed 1826), I. 31.

They were so ecstasized with joy that they made the heavens ring with triumphant shouts and exclamations.

J. Scott, Christian Life, I. iv. § 5.

ecstatic (ēk-stat'ik), a. and n. [Formerly ecstasick, estatic; = F. extatique = Sp. extático = Pg. extático = It. estatico, < Gr. ēkstasy, < ēkstasy, < ēkstasy: see ecstasy.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to or resulting from ecstasy; entrancing; overpowering.

In pensive trance, and anguish, and ecstatic fit.
Milton, The Passion, l. 42.
To gain Pescennius one employs his schemes;
One grasps a Cicerone in ecstatic dreams.
Pope, To Addison.

The Honnets (Mrs. Brownings) reveal to us that Love which is the most ecstatic of human emotions and worth all other gifts in life. Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 135.

2. Affected by ecstasy; enraptured; entranced.
By making no response to ordinary stimuli, the ecstatic subject shows that he is "not himself."
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 77.

II. 1. One subject to ecstasies or raptures; an extravagant enthusiast. [Rare.]

Old florists and like ecstatics, such as the very primitive times were infinitely pestered withal.
Bp. Gauden, Tears of the Church, p. 201.

2. pl. Ecstasy; rapturous emotion.

ecstatical (ek-stat'i-kal), a. [Formerly ecstatical; < ecstatic + -al.] Same as ecstatic.

With other ecstatical furies, and religious frenzies, with ornaments of gold and jewels. Purcell, Pilgrimage, p. 61.

ecstatically (ek-stat'i-kal-i), adv. In an ecstatic manner; rapturously; ravishingly.

ectad (ek'tad), adv. [< Gr. ektós, without, outside, + -ad, < L. ad, to.] In anat., to or toward the outside or exterior; outward; outwardly.

The dura mater may be described as ectad of the brain, but entad of the granulum.
Wilder and Gage, Anat. Tech., p. 27.

ectal (ek'tal), a. [< Gr. ektós, without, + -al.]
In anat., outer; external; superficial; peripheral: opposed to ental.

The suggestion to employ ental and ectal was welcomed, and they were published (by Wilder in 1881).
Wilder and Gage, Anat. Tech., p. 27.

ectasia (ek-tá-si-ä), n. [NL.; see ectasis.] 1.
Ectasia.—2. Aneurism. — Alveolar ectasia. Same as alveolar emphysema (which see, under emphysema).

ectasis (ek'tá-sis), n. [LL.; < Gr. ektasis, extension, < ekteinō (= L. extendo), extend, < ek, out, + teivō, stretch: see extend, tend.] 1.
In anc. orthoepy and pros.: (a) The pronunciation of a vowel as long. (b) The lengthening or protraction of a vowel usually short. See diastole.—2. In anc. rhet.: (a) The use of a long vowel or syllable in a part of a clause or sentence where it will produce a special rhythmical effect. (b) The use of a form of a word longer than that commonly employed. This is generally called paragoge.

ectaster (ek-tas'tör), n. [NL.; < Gr. ektós, without, + astēr, star.] A kind of sponge-spicule.
Sollan.

ectatic (ek-tat'ik), a. [< Gr. ektaticós, capable of extension, < ekteinō, extend: see ectasis.]
Exhibiting or pertaining to ectasis.

ectasy, ectesies (ek'te-nē-sis), n. [< Gr. ektasis, also ektēsis, n., prop. adj., extended, continued (see ikeia, akrois, ekchō, or epitēsis, supplication, prayer), < ekteinō, stretch out, prolong: see ectasis and extend.] In the Gr.
Ch., one of the litanies recited by the deacon and choir. It follows the gospel, and is introduced by the words "Let us all say with our whole soul, and with our whole mind let us say." The choir responds with Kyrie Eleison, once after this invitation and the first petition, and thrice after the other petitions. See litany.

ectental (ek-ten'tal), a. [< Gr. ektós, without, + entós, within, + -al.] In embryol., of or pertaining to the outer and the inner layer of a gastrula: specifically said of the line of primitive junction of the ectoderm and endoderm cir-cumscribing the mouth of a gastrula. Also ecto-ental.

ecteron (ek'te-ron), n. An erroneous form of ecteron. Micart.

ecteronic (ek'te-ron'ik), a. An erroneous form of ecteronic. Micart.

ecthesia (ek'the-sis), n. [< Gr. ekthesis, a setting forth, an exposition, < ektherō, verbal adj. of ekthērō, put out, set forth, < ek, out, + thērō, put, set.] An exposition, especially of faith.
In church history the ecthesis is the decree of the emperor Heraclius, about A. D. 628, declaring that the controversy as to whether Christ has two wills or one will with a twofold or theandric operation (a view acceptable to the Monotheletes) was to be left an open question.

The (first) Lateran synod, by which not only the Monothelete doctrine but also the moderating ecthesis of Hera-clius and typus of Constant II. were anathematized.
Encyc. Brit., XV. 646.

ecthlipsis (ek-thlip'sis), n. [LL.; < Gr. ekthlipsis, ecthlipsis, lit. a squeezing out, < ekthlipsis, squeeze out, < ek, out, + thlipsis, squeeze. Cf.
elision.] In Gr. and Lat. gram., omission or suppression of a letter; especially, in Lat.
gram., elision or suppression in utterance of a final vowel and consonant in a syllable ending in m, as in the line

Monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens, cui lumen ademptum. Virgil, Aeneid, III. 655.

ecthoræa, n. Plural of ecthoræum.

ecthoræal, ecthoræal (ek-thō-rē'al), a. [< ec-thoræum + -al.] Pertaining to an ecthoræum:
as, an ecthoræal protrusion.

ecthoræum (ek-thō-rē'um), n.; pl. ecthoræa (-ä). [NL.; < Gr. ek, out, out of, + thorax, containing the seed, < thorō, seed, semen.] In zool., the thread of a thread-cell; the stinging-hair of a cnida; a cnidocil. Also ecthoræum. See cut under cnida.

The inner wall of the sac (cnida) is produced into a sheath terminating in a long thread (ecthoræum); this is usually twisted in many coils round its sheath, and fills up the open end of the sac. Pascoe, Zool. Class., p. 16.

ecthyma (ek-thi'mä), n.; pl. ecthymata (ekthi'mä-tä). [NL.; < Gr. ekthyma, a pustule, papula, < ekthō, break out, as heat or humors, < ek, out, + thō, rage, boil, rush.] In pathol., a large pustule intermediate in character between a furuncle or boil and an ordinary pustule.

ecthymiform (ek-thi'mi-fōrm), a. [< Gr. ekthyma (ekthyma), a pustule, papula (see ecthyma), +
L. forma, form.] Having the form of or resembling an ecthyma.

ecto- [NL. ecto-, < Gr. ektós, adv. and prep., without, outside (opposed to entós, within: see ento-), < ek, out, + quasi-superl. suffix -to-.] A prefix in words (chiefly biological) of Greek origin, signifying 'outside, without, outer, external, lying upon': as, ectoderm, the outer skin; Ectozoa, external parasites: opposed to endo-, ento-.

ectobasidium (ek'tō-bā-si-d'i-um), n.; pl. ecto-basidia (-ä). [NL.; < Gr. ektós, outside, + NL.
basidium, q. v.] In mycol., a basidium that is externally placed, as in Hymenomyces. Le Maout and Decasne, Botany (trans.), p. 354.

Ectobia (ek'tō-bi-ä), n. [NL.; < Gr. ektós, outside, + bios, life.] A genus of cursorial orthop-terous insects, of the family Blattellidae, or cockroaches, containing a number of small species, as E. germanica, the cricket-bug (which see):
sometimes synonymous with Blatta in a restricted sense. Westwood, 1839.

ectoblast (ek'tō-blást), n. [< Gr. ektós, outside, + blastō, a bud, germ.] 1. In biol., the outermost recognizable structure of a cell; a cell-wall, in any way distinguished from mesoblast or other more interior structures. The ecto-blast is to a cell what the epiblast is to a more complex organism.—2. In embryol., the outer primary layer in the embryo of any metazoan animal; the epiblast; the ectoderm. See cut under blastocoele.

ectoblastic (ek'tō-blás'tik), a. [< ectoblast +
-ic.] Pertaining to the ectoblast; consisting of ectoblast; ectodermal.

ectobliquus (ek'tō-bli'kwus), n.; pl. ectobliqui (-kwī). [NL.; < Gr. ektós, outside, + L. obli-quus, oblique.] In anat., the external oblique muscle of the abdomen, the oblique abdominis externus. Also called extrobliquus. See cut under muscle.

ectocardia (ek'tō-kär'di-ä), n. [NL.; < Gr. ek-tós, outside, + kardia, heart.] In teratol., a malformation in which the heart is out of its normal position.

ectocarotid (ek'tō-ka-rot'id), n. [< Gr. ektós, outside, + E. carotid.] In anat., the external carotid artery; the outer branch of the common carotid.

Ectocarpacæa (ek'tō-kär-pä-sä-ä), n. pl. [NL.;
< Ectocarpus + -acæa.] A family of phaeosporid marine algae having filamentous branching fronds, chiefly monosiphonous, with little or no cortex.

Ectocarpæa (ek'tō-kär-pä-ä), n. pl. [NL.; <
Ectocarpus + -æa.] 1. In bot., same as Ectocarpacæa.—2. In zool., a division of nematophorous Polychæta, containing those hydrozoans whose genitalia are developed from the ectoderm: opposed to Ectocarpæa. The group is equivalent to the Hydromedusæ.

ectocarpous (ek'tō-kär-pus), a. [< NL. ecto-carpus, < Gr. ektós, outside, + karpós, fruit.] Having external genitals, or developing sexual products from the ectoderm, as a hydromedusan; of or pertaining to the Ectocarpæa.

Ectocarpus (ek'tō-kär-pus), n. [NL.; see ecto-carpus.] In bot., the principal genus of Ecto-carpæa, including a large number of olive-brown filamentous species, many of which grow attached to larger algae.

ectochona (ek-tō-kō'nä), n.; pl. ectochonæ (-næ).
[NL.; < Gr. ektós, outside, + chōnē, a funnel: see chone.] An ectochone.

ectochone (ek'tō-kōn), n. [< NL. ectochona,
q. v.] The outer division of a chone.
In many sponges (Geodia, Stelletta) the cortical domes are constricted near their communication with the subdermal cavity (subcortical crypt) by a transverse muscular sphincter, which defines an outer division or ectochone from an inner or endochone. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 415.

ectoclinal (ek-tō-kli'näl), a. [< Gr. ektós, outside, + klinē, lean: see clinic, clinode.] In bot., having the clinode (hymenium) and spores exposed upon the surface of the receptacle. Le Maout and Decasne, Botany (trans.), p. 356.

ectocolian (ek'tō-kō-li-an), a. [< Gr. ektós, outside, + kōlōn, a hollow.] In anat., extraventricular; situated outside of the cavities of the brain: applied to that part of the corpus striatum (the nucleus lenticularis) which appears embedded in the wall of the hemisphere. Wilder.

ectocolic (ek'tō-kō'lik), a. [As ectoceli- +
-ic.] Situated on the outside of the common cavity of a caelenterate.

A misleading appearance of ectocolic supts. is produced by the fact that some pairs of mesenteries die out after a very short course.

G. H. Fowler, Micros. Science, XXVIII. 6.

ectocondyle (ek'tō-kōn'dil), n. [< Gr. ektós, outside, + E. condyle.] The outer or external condyle of a bone, on the side away from the body:
said especially of the condyles at the lower end of the humerus and of the femur respectively: opposed to entocondyle. See epicondyle.

ectocoracoid (ek'tō-kōr'a-koid), a. [< Gr. ektós, outside, + NL. coracoides, the coracoid.] In the dipnoan fishes, the element of the shouldergirdle outside of that with which the pectoral limb articulates. Also called clariete.

ectocranial (ek'tō-kra'ni-äl), a. [< Gr. ektós, outside, + cranium, skull: see cranium.] Of or pertaining to the outer walls or surface of the skull; forming a part of the cranial parietes, as a bone.

There is a large bony tract . . . between the squamosal and the large interparietal, which is not one of the ordinary ectocranial bones.

W. K. Parker, Proc. Roy. Soc., XXXVIII. 135.

ectocuneiform (ek'tō-kū'nē-i-fōrm), a. and n.
[< NL. ectocuneiformis, q. v.] 1. In anat., pertaining to the outermost cuneiform bone;
ectosphenoid.

Union of the navicular and cuboid, and sometimes the ectocuneiform bone, of the tarsus.

W. H. Flower, Encyc. Brit., XV. 430.

II. 2. The outermost one of the three cunei-form or wedge-shaped bones of the distal row of tarsal bones; the ectocuneiform or ectosphenoid bone of the foot. See cut under foot.

ectocuneiforme (ek'tō-kū'nē-i-fōr'mē), n.; pl. ectocuneiformia (-mi-ä). [NL.; < Gr. ektós, without, + NL. cuneiformis, the cuneiform bone.]
Same as ectocuneiform.

ectocyst (ek'tō-sist), n. [< Gr. ektós, outside, + cystis, a bladder: see cyst.] In Polysoa, the external tegumentary layer of the coenocidium, forming the common cell ec-cyst in which each individual zooid is contained. See the extract, and cuts under Polysoa and Plumatella.

As a rule the colonies (of polysoids) possess a horny or parchment-like, frequently also calcareous, exoskeleton, which arises from the hardening of the cuticle around the individual zooids. Each zooid is accordingly surrounded by a very regular and symmetrical case—the ectocyst or cell: through the opening of which the anterior part of the soft body of the contained zooid with its tentacular crown can be protruded. Claus, Zoology (trans.), II. 71.

ectoderm (ek'tō-dërm), n. [< Gr. ektós, outside, + derma, skin: see derm.] The completed outer layer of cells, or outer blastodermic membrane, in all metazoan animals, formed by the cells of the epiblast, and primitively constituting the outer wall of the whole body, as the endoderm does that of the body-cavity; an epiblast, ecto-blast, or external blastoderm. The term is chiefly used in embryology, or of certain lower animals whose bodies consist essentially of an outer and an inner layer, and not as a synonym of the epidermis or cuticle of the higher animals. See cut under gastrula.

ectodermal (ek'tō-dër'mäl), a. [< ectoderm +
-al.] Pertaining to the ectoderm; consisting of ectoderm: as, the ectodermal layer of a cel-enterate.

The ovary bursts its ectodermal covering.

W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 314.

ectodermic (ek'tō-dër'mik), a. [< ectoderm +
-ic.] Same as ectodermal.

ecto-entad (ek'tō-en'tad), adv. [< Gr. ektós, without, + entós, within, + -ad. Cf. ecto-ental, entad.] In anat., from without inward. [Rare.]

A body may be divided by cutting either out-ward, from without inward, or cut-in-ward, from within outward.

Wilder and Gage, Anat. Trans., p. 27.

ecto-entel (ek-tō-en-tal), a. Same as ectental.
The mesoderm grows out from the ectental line.
C. S. Miao, Medical News, XLIX, 249.

ectogastrocnemius (ek-tō-gas-trok-nē-mi-us), n.; pl. ectogastrocnemii (-i). [NL., < Gr. ektōs, outside, + gastēr, stomach, + cnēmis, the lower leg, tibia.] The outer gastrocnemial muscle, or outer head of the gastrocnemius; the gastrocnemius externus. See cut under muscle.

ectogenous (ek-tōj-e-nus), a. [< Gr. ektōs, outside, + gēnos, producing: see -genous.] Originating or developed outside of the host; externally parasitic: opposed to endogenous.

Some of the pathogenic bacteria are accustomed to develop and multiply within the body, while others only do so within it. The former kind we may describe as ectogenous, the latter as endogenous.

Kiepert, Pathol. Anat. (trans.), I, § 203.

ectogluteus (ek-tō-glō-tē-us), n.; pl. ectoglutei (-i). [NL., < Gr. ektōs, without, + glōtis, the rump, buttocks: see gluteus, gluteal.] In anat., the outer or great gluteal muscle; the gluteus maximus. Also ectogluteus. See cut under muscle.

ectogluteal (ek-tō-glō-tē-al), a. [< ectogluteus + -al.] Pertaining to the ectogluteus. Also ectogluteal.

ectolecithal (ek-tō-lea-i-thal), a. [< Gr. ektōs, outside, + lekthōs, yolk, + -al.] In embryol., noting those ova which have the food-yolk peripheral in position, and thus exterior to the formative yolk. The cleavage or segmentation is consequently confined at first to the inner parts of the ovum, and it is only in later stages, when the food-yolk has shifted to the center, that the cleavage becomes peripheral. The egg of the spider is an example. See centrolecithal, telolecithal.

The first processes of segmentation in these at first ectolecithal ova are withdrawn from observation, since they take place in the centre of an egg covered by a superficial layer of food-yolk.
Claus, Zoology (trans.), I, 112.

Ectolithia (ek-tō-lith-i-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ektōs, outside, + lithōs, stone.] Those radiolarians which have an external siliceous skeleton or exoskeleton: distinguished from Endolithia.

Only a few (radiolarians) remain naked and without firm deposits, as a rule, the soft body possesses a siliceous skeleton, which either lies entirely outside the central capsule (Ectolithia), or is partially within it (Endolithia).
Claus, Zoology (trans.), I, 189.

ectolithic (ek-tō-lith-i'k), a. [As Ectolithia + -ic.] Extracapsular or exoskeletal, as the skeleton of a radiolarian; of or pertaining to the Ectolithia; not endolithic.

ectomere (ek-tō-mēr), n. [< Gr. ektōs, outside, + meros, part.] In embryol., the less granular of the two blastomeres into which the mammalian ovum divides; also applied to a descendant of this blastomere in the first stages of development. See blastomere, entomere.

ectomeric (ek-tō-mēr-i'k), a. [< ectomere + -ic.] Having the character of an ectomere.

ectoparasite (ek-tō-par-a-sit), n. [< Gr. ektōs, outside, + parásitos, a parasite: see parasite.] An external parasite; a parasite living upon the exterior of the host, as distinguished from an endoparasite. Lice, fleas, ticks, etc., are ectoparasites. The term has no classificatory significance in zoology or botany.

ectoparasitic (ek-tō-par-a-sit-i'k), a. [< ectoparasite + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of an ectoparasite or of ectoparasites; epizotic.

In the entoparasitic forms of this division the visual organs disappear, while they are persistent in many of the ectoparasitic forms.

Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 151.

ectopectoralis (ek-tō-pek-tō-rā-lis), n.; pl. ectopectorales (-lēz). [< Gr. ektōs, outside, + l. pectoralis, pectoral: see pectoral.] In anat., the outer or great pectoral muscle; the pectoralis major (which see, under pectoralis).

ectopia (ek-tō-pi-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ektōs, away from a place, out of place, out of the way, + topos, place: see topic.] In pathol., morbid displacement of parts, usually congenital: as, ectopia of the heart or of the bladder. Also ectopy.

ectopic (ek-tōp-i'k), a. [< ectopia + -ic.] Characterized by ectopia.

The position is ectopic, that is, proceeding in an abnormal locality, which is unfit for the office imposed upon it.
R. Barnes, Dis. of Women, p. 379.

Ectopistes (ek-tō-pis-tēs), n. [NL., < Gr. ektōs, wander, migrate, + istis, away from a place, + topos, place.] A genus of pigeons, of the family Columbidae. They have short tufted feathers on the head in front, a short bill feathered far forward, the wings acutely pointed by the first three primaries, a long cuneate tail of 12 tapering acuminate feathers, wing-coverts with black spots, partly-colored tail-feathers, an iridescent neck, and the sexes distinguishable by color. E. macrourus is the common wild pigeon or passenger-pigeon of North America. See cut under passenger-pigeon.

ectoplasm (ek-tō-plazm), n. [< Gr. ektōs, without, + plasma, a thing formed, + plasma, form.] 1. In zool., the exterior protoplasm or sarcolemma of a cell: the ectosarc: applied to the denser exterior substance of Infusorians and other unicellular organisms, or of a free protoplasmic body, as a zoospore.

In the Infusoria, which are covered by a firm cuticle, there is a central semifluid mass of sarcode (endoplasm) which is distinct from the more compact peripheral layer of sarcode (ectoplasm).
Claus, Zoology (trans.), I, 64.

2. In bot., the outer hyaline layer or film of the protoplasmic mass within a cell.

ectoplasmic (ek-tō-plaz-mik), a. [< ectoplasm + -ic.] Pertaining to or consisting of ectoplasm.

ectoplastic (ek-tō-plas-tik), a. Same as ectoplasmic.

The differentiation of this cortical substance (which is not a frequent or striking phenomenon in tissue cells) may be regarded as an ectoplastic (i. e., peripheral) modification of the protoplasm, comparable to the ectoplastic (central) modification which produces a nucleus.
E. R. Lankester, Encyc. Brit., XIX, 833.

ectopopliteal (ek-tō-pop-lit-ē-al), a. [< Gr. ektōs, outside, + l. popliteus (poplit-), hook, knee: see popliteal.] In anat., situated upon the outer side of the popliteal space or region: as, the ectopopliteal nerve.

Ectoprocta (ek-tō-prok-tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of ectoproctus.] A division of the Polyzoa established by Nitche, characterized by having the anus outside of the circle of tentacles: opposed to Endoprocta. See the extract.

In the Ectoprocta, . . . the embryo consists of two layers, an outer and inner of which the former is the representative of the ectoderm in other animals. The latter lines the walls of the perivisceral cavity, and is reflected thence, like a peritoneal tunic, over the tentacular sheath and into the interior of the tentacula, whence it is continued on to the alimentary canal, of which it forms the external investment. The endoderm, which lines the alimentary canal, is of course continuous, through the oral opening, with the ectoderm.
Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 611.

ectoproctous (ek-tō-prok-tus), a. [< NL. ectoproctus, < Gr. ektōs, outside, + proctos, the anus, posterior.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Ectoprocta: specifically applied to those polyzoons, as the Gymnolamata, which have the anus situated outside the circle of tentacles: opposed to endoproctous.

It has been pointed out that the characteristic polyplide of the ectoproctous Polyzoa is a structure developed from the cystid.
Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 306.

ectopterygoid (ek-tōp-ter-i-goi-dē-us), a. and n. [< NL. ectopterygoides, q. v.] 1. a. Pertaining to the external pterygoid bone or muscle.

2. n. 1. An external pterygoid bone; one of the lateral bones of the palate of some animals, as reptiles. It is highly developed, for instance, in the crocodile. See Crocodylia.—2. In typical fishes, the external of two bones just behind the palatine, generally called pterygoid. See cut under palatohyoid.—3. In anat., the ectopterygoid muscle.

ectopterygoides (ek-tōp-ter-i-goi-dē-us), n.; pl. ectopterygoides (-i). [NL., < Gr. ektōs, outside, + NL. pterygoides: see pterygoid.] In anat., the external pterygoid muscle. See pterygoides.

ectopy (ek-tō-pi), n. Same as ectopia.

ectosarc (ek-tō-sārk), n. [< Gr. ektōs, outside, + sarx (sarp-), flesh.] The ectoplasm of a protozoan; the exterior substance of the body of an animal of low organization, as an amoeba or other rhizopod or protozoan, in any way distinguished from an endosarc; the usually thicker, denser, tougher, or otherwise modified protoplasm which forms an envelop of the body, as differentiated from the interior substance or contents. The term is used chiefly in connection with amoebas or other rhizopods, in which, though there may be no definite cell wall, the outer sarcode is differentiated in some way from the inner substance, or endosarc.

ectosarcode (ek-tō-sār-kōd), n. Same as ectosarc.

ectosarcodous (ek-tō-sār-kō-dus), a. [< ectosarcode + -ous.] Consisting of external sarcode; constituting an ectosarc; ectoplasmic.

ectosarcous (ek-tō-sār-kus), a. [< ectosarc + -ous.] Of or pertaining to the ectosarc.

ectosomal (ek-tō-sō-mal), a. [< ectosome + -al.] Of or pertaining to the ectosome; cortical, as the exterior region of a sponge.

ectosome (ek-tō-sōm), n. [< Gr. ektōs, outside, + sōma, body.] In sponges, the outer region, forming the roof and walls of the subdermal chambers, composed of ectoderm and a superficial layer of endoderm; the cortex: distinguished from chaonosome and endosome.

The chaonosome forms a middle layer between a reticulation of ectosome on the one side and of endoderm and mesoderm, i. e., endosome, on the other.
Sollas, Kroye Brit., XXII, 415.

ectosphenoid (ek-tō-sfē-noid), n. [< Gr. ektōs, without, + sphenoidēs, wedge-shaped: see sphenoid.] Same as ectocuneiform. [Rare.]

ectosporous (ek-tō-spō-rus), a. [< Gr. ektōs, outside, + spora, seed: see spore.] Forming spores externally; exosporous.

ectosteal (ek-tō-tē-al), a. [< Gr. ektōs, outside, + stēon, bone, + -al.] Relating to or situated on the outside of a bone; proceeding from without inward, as a growth of bone.

ectosteally (ek-tō-tē-al-i), adv. In an ectosteal manner or position.

ectostosis (ek-tō-tō-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ektōs, outside, + stēon, bone, + -osis.] That form of ossification of cartilage which begins in or immediately under the perichondrium; also, growth of bone from without inward; periosteal ossification.

ectothecal (ek-tō-thē-kal), a. [< Gr. ektōs, outside, + thēca, case: see theca.] In bot., having them or as exposed, as in diacomyetous fungi and gymnocarpous lichens; diacomyetous; gymnocarpous.

ectotriceps (ek-tō-tri-sēps), n.; pl. ectotriceptiles (ek-tō-tri-sēp-tē-lēs). [NL., < Gr. ektōs, outside, + NL. triceps.] In anat., the outer head or external division of the triceps muscle of the arm, considered as a distinct muscle. Also ectotriceps.

Ectozoa (ek-tō-zō-ā), n. pl. [NL., pl. of ectozoön, q. v.] External parasites in general, as distinguished from Entozoa, or internal parasites. Thus, the fish lice, or Kyriozoa, are Ectozoa, as are other lice, ticks, fleas, etc. The term is a vague one, having no classificatory significance, and implying no structural affinity among the creatures designated by it. Also called ectoparasites.

ectozoan (ek-tō-zō-ān), n. [< Ectozoa + -an.] One of the Ectozoa; an epizoon; an ectoparasite.

ectozoic (ek-tō-zō-ik), a. [< Ectozoa + -ic.] Pertaining to the Ectozoa; epizotic; ectoparasitic.

ectozoön (ek-tō-zō-on), n. [NL., < Gr. ektōs, outside, + zōon, animal.] One of the Ectozoa; an ectozoan.

Ectrephes (ek-trē-fēs), n. [NL. (Pursh, 1806), < Gr. ektrepheō, bring up, breed, produce, + ek, out, + trēphō, nourish.] A genus of beetles, of the family Pisidae, containing a few Australian species. Also Anapestus.

Ectrichodia (ek-tri-kō-dē-ā), n. [NL. (Serville, 1825), < Gr. ek, out, + trichōs, like hair, hairy, + ōdē (trich-), hair, + ōdē, form.] A genus of bugs, of the family Reduviidae and subfamily Ectrichodinae. E. cruciata is a generally distributed species in the United States, about half an inch long, of a shining bright-red color, variegated with black, short, stout, hairy antennae of a dusky color, and thick, pleonous rostrum.

Ectrichodides (ek-tri-kōd-i-dēs), n. pl. [NL., < Ectrichodia + -ides.] A group of hemipterous insects, represented by the genus Ectrichodia. Same as Ectrichodinae.

Ectrichodinae (ek-tri-kōd-i-nā), n. pl. [NL., < Ectrichodia + -inae.] A subfamily of bugs, of the family Reduviidae, typified by the genus Ectrichodia.

ectrodactylia (ek-trō-dak-ti-lē-ā), n. [NL., irreg. < Gr. ektropōn, misarranging, + daktylōn, finger.] In teratol., a malformation in which one or more fingers are wanting.

ectrodactylism (ek-trō-dak-ti-lizm), n. [As ectrodactylia + -ism.] Same as ectrodactylia.

ectropic (ek-trōp-i'k), a. [< Gr. ektropōn, turning out of the way, + tropē, turn out, + ek, out, + trēphō, turn.] Turned outward or everted, as an eyelid, when the inner or conjunctival surface is exposed, as in ectropion.

Ectrichodia cruciata.

ectropical (ek-trop'i-kal), a. [< Gr. ek, out, + τροπικός, tropic (see tropic), + -al.] Belonging to parts outside the tropics; extratropical. [Rare.] ectropion, ectropium (ek-trō'pi-on, -um), n. [N.L., < Gr. ἐκτροπίων, everted eyelid, < ἐκτροπος, turning out: see ectropic.] In pathol.: (a) An abnormal eversion or turning outward of the eyelids. (b) Eversion of the cervical endometrium of the womb.

ectropometer (ek-trō-pom'e-tēr), n. [< Gr. ἐκτροπή, a turning off, turning aside (< ἐκτρέπω, turn off: see ectropic), + μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument used on shipboard for determining the bearing or compass-direction of objects. The ectropometer in use in the United States Navy consists of a vertical stand fitted in sockets on the deck or bridge and surmounted by a compass-card without a magnet. The card turns on a vertical axis and is fitted with an alidade. The magnetic heading of the ship being adjusted on this card to a line parallel with the keel, the alidade gives readily the bearing of land, lighthouses, etc. Also ectropometer.

ectrotic (ek-trot'ik), a. [< Gr. ἐκτροτικός, of or for abortion, < ἐκτροπή, abortion, < ἐκτρέπω, verbal adj. of ἐκτρέπω, abort, < ek, out, + τρέπω, τρέπω, wound, injure.] In med., preventing the development or causing the abortion of a disease.

ectypal (ek'ti-pal), a. [< ectype + -al.] Taken from the original; imitated. [Rare.]

Examples of all the ectypal copies.

Rilla, Knowledge of Divine Things, p. 417.

Ectypal world, in Platonic philosophy, the phenomenal world, the world of sense, as distinguished from the archetypal or noumenal world.

ectype (ek'tip), n. [= F. ectype = Sp. ectipo = Pg. ectypo, < L. ectypus, engraved in relief, embossed, < Gr. ἐκτύπος, engraved in relief, formed in outline, < ek, out, + τύπος, figura: see type.] 1. A reproduction or copy of an original; a copy: opposed to prototype.

The complex ideas of substance are ectypes or "copies." Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxii. 13.

Some regarded him [Klopstock] as an ectype of the ancient prophets. Eng. Cyc. Specifically—2. In arch., a copy in relief or embossed.

ectypography (ek-ti-pog'ra-fi), n. [< Gr. ἐκτύπος, engraved in relief (see ectype), + -γραφία, < γράφω, write, engrave.] A method of etching in which the lines are left in relief upon the plate instead of being sunk into it.

écu (ū-kū' or ū-kū'), n. [F., a shield (applied also to a coin, etc.), < OF. escu, escut, < L. scutum, a shield: see escutcheon, scutum.] 1. The shield carried by a mounted man-at-arms in the middle ages; especially, the triangular shield of no great length carried during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, and hung around the neck by the girth, so as to cover the left arm and left side.—2. The name of several gold and silver coins current in France from the fourteenth century onward, having a shield as part of their type: In English usually rendered crown. Among these coins were the écu d'or (golden crown), the écu à la couronne (écu with the crown).

of issue 20 shillings English.—4. In France, a sum of money, formerly consisting of three francs, now generally of five francs.—5. A vegetable tracing-paper, 15 × 20 inches. Drummond.

Ecuadoran (ek-wā-dō'ran), a. and n. [< Ecuador + -an.] Same as Ecuadorian.

Ecuadorian (ek-wā-dō'ri-an), a. and n. [< Ecuador (Sp. Ecuador, so called because crossed by the equator, < Sp. ecuador = E. equator) + -ian.] 1. a. Pertaining to Ecuador: as, the Ecuadorian fauna.

The Ecuadorian section [of the Andes].

Encyc. Brit., VII. 644.

II. n. A native of Ecuador, a republic of South America, on the Pacific, north of Peru.

ecumenic, ecumenic (ek-ū-men'ik), a. [= F. ecumenique = Sp. ecuménico = Pg. It. ecumenico (cf. G. ökumenisch = Dan. Sw. ökumenisk), < L. ecumenicus, (< Gr. οἰκουμένης, general, universal, of or from the whole world, < οἰκουμένη, the inhabited world, the whole world, fem. (see oikē, earth) of οἰκουμένος, pp. pass. of οἰκω, inhabit, < oikos, a house: see economy.)] Same as ecumenical (which is the usual form).

ecumenical, ecumenical (ek-ū-men'i-kal), a. [< ecumenic, ecumenic, + -al.] General; universal; specifically, belonging to the entire Christian church.

No other literature [than the French] exhibits so expansive and ecumenical a genius, or expounds so skillfully or appreciates so generously foreign ideas. Locky, Europ. Morals, I. 100.

The assumption of the title of Ecumenical Patriarch was another proof of the vast designs entertained by the Bishops of Constantinople.

J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, I. 29.

Both kings bound themselves to maintain the Catholic worship inviolate, . . . and agreed that an ecumenical council should at once assemble, to compose the religious differences. Molloy, Dutch Republic, I. 202.

The ancient Greek Church is the mother of ecumenical orthodoxy; she elaborated the fundamental dogmas of the Trinity and the Person of Christ, as laid down in the Apostles' and the Nicene creeds. Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 10.

Ecumenical bishop, a title first assumed by John the Faster, Patriarch of Constantinople, in the latter part of the sixth century. Gregory the Great, Bishop of Rome (590-604), strongly opposed the use of the title; but from the time of Boniface III. (607), on whom it was conferred by the emperor Phocas, it has been used by the popes as their right.—Ecumenical council. See council, 7.—Ecumenical divines, in the Gr. Ch., a title given to St. Basil the Great, St. Gregory the Divine, and St. John Chrysostom.

ecumenically, ecumenically (ek-ū-men'i-kal-l), adv. In a general or ecumenical manner.

ecumenicity, ecumenicity (ek-ū-me-nis'i-ti), n. [= F. ecumenicité = Pg. ecumenicidade; as ecumenic, ecumenic, + -ity.] The character of being ecumenical.

écusson (ē-kū-sōn'), n. [F.: see escutcheon.] In her., an escutcheon, especially an escutcheon of pretense, or inescutcheon.

ecypheate (ē-si-fel'at), a. [< N.L. "ecyphe-latus," < L. e-priv. + N.L. cyphella, q. v.] In bot., without cyphella: applied to lichens, etc.

eczema (ek'ze-mā), n. [N.L., < Gr. ἐκζέω, a cutaneous eruption, < ἐκζω, boil up or out, < ek, out, + ζω, boil.] An inflammation of the skin attended with considerable exudation of lymph. Ordinarily the eczematous patch is red, slightly swollen, more or less incrustated, and moist on the removal of the crust, and causes considerable itching and smarting. Eczema papulosum, the form of eczema characterized by papules, the swollen papillae of the skin.—Eczema rubrum. (a) Psoriasis rubra. (b) Acute eczema when the color of the skin is very red.—Eczema squamosum. (a) Chronic eczema marked by the exfoliation of large quantities of epithelial scales. (b) Psoriasis rubra.—Erythematous eczema, a mild form of eczema, marked by little more than redness of the skin (erythema).—Vesicular eczema, the form or stage of eczema in which the eruption consists of vesicles containing serum.

eczematous (ek-zem'a-tus), a. [= F. eczémateux; < eczema (t) + -ous.] 1. Pertaining to or produced by eczema: as, eczematous eruptions.—2. Afflicted with eczema.

ed. An abbreviation (a) of editor; (b) of edition.

ed¹. [ME. ed., < AS. ed- = OS. idag = OFries. et- = OHG. it-, ita-, MHG. ite- = Icel. idā- = Goth. id-, a prefix equiv. to L. re-, again, back: see re-.] A prefix now obsolete or occurring unfelt in a few words, meaning 'again, back, re-' as in edgrow, edgrowth, ednew. See eddish, eddy.

Ed². [ME. Ed., < AS. Edd-, a common element in proper names, being add, happiness, prosperity, = OS. öd, estate, property, wealth, prosperity, = OHG. ot, estate, = Icel. auðr, riches, wealth: see allodium.] An element in proper names of Anglo-Saxon origin, meaning originally 'property' (in Anglo-Saxon, 'prosperity' or 'happiness'), as Edwards, Anglo-Saxon Eadweard, protector of property; Edwin, Anglo-Saxon Eadwine, gainer or friend of property.

ed¹, ed². [(1) ed¹, pret. Edentata (ē-den-tā'tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. edentatus, toothless; see edentate.] 1. In mammal., a Cuvierian order of mammals; the edentates. The term is literally incorrect, and in so far objectionable, few of these animals being edentulous or toothless; and the Linnean equivalent term, Bruta, is often employed instead. But the name is firmly established, and the members of the order do agree in certain dental characters, which are these: that incisors are never present, and that the teeth, when there are any, are homodont and (excepting in Tatusia) monophyodont, growing from persistent pulps, and being devoid of enamel.

The Edentata are in due proportion placental mammals, with a relatively small cerebrum of one lobe, but otherwise very diversified in structure, appearance, and mode of life; the old-world forms are likewise widely different from those of the new world; most edentates are of the latter. The armadillos, sloths, and ant-eaters of America, and the fabled ant-eaters and senly ant-eaters of Africa and Asia, represent respectively five leading types of Edentata, affording a division of the order into the five suborders Loricata (armadillos), Tardigrada (sloths), Verminipinna (American ant-eaters), Squammata (senly ant-eaters or pangolins), and Fidulenta (fabled ant-eaters or mandrills). The tardigrades, including a number of gigantic fossil forms, as the mylodons and megatheriums, formerly called Gravigrada, are herbivorous, and the living forms are all arboreal. The others are carnivorous and chiefly insectivorous, and it is among these that the entirely toothless forms occur, as in the ant-eaters. The Cuvierian Edentata included the Mouthemata, now long since eliminated.

2. A group of crustaceans. Latreille, 1823.

edentate (ē-den'tāt), a. and n. [= E. edent = Sp. edentado, < L. edentatus, toothless, pp. of edentare, render toothless, < e, out, + den(t)- = E. tooth; cf. dentate; see Edentata.] 1. a. 1. Edentulous; toothless. 2. Of or pertaining to the Edentata, and thus having at least no front teeth.

II. n. 1. One of the Edentata: an invertebrate placental mammal without incisors. 2. A toothless creature.

= Syn. To teach, rear, discipline, develop, nurture, breed, indoctrinate, school, drill.

education (ed'ū-kā'shon), n. [= F. éducation = Sp. educación = It. educazione, < L. educatio (> n), a breeding, bringing up, rearing, < educare, educate: see educate.]

1. The imparting or acquisition of knowledge; mental and moral training; cultivation of the mind, feelings, and manners. Education in a broad sense, with reference to man, comprehends all that disciplines and enlightens the understanding, corrects the temper, cultivates the taste, and forms the manners and habits; in a narrower sense, it is the special course of training pursued, as by parents or teachers, to secure any one of all of these ends. Under physical education is included all that relates to the development and care of the organs of sensation and of the muscular and nervous systems. Intellectual education comprehends the means by which the powers of the understanding are developed and improved, and knowledge is imparted. Esthetic education is the development of the sense of the beautiful, and of technical skill in the arts. Moral education is the cultivation of the moral nature. Technical education is intended to train persons in the arts and sciences that underlie the practice of the trades or professions. Education is further divided into primary education, or instruction in the first elements of knowledge, received by children in common or elementary schools or at home; secondary, that received in grammar and high schools or in academies, higher, that received in colleges, universities, and postgraduate study, and special or professional, that which aims to fit one for the particular vocation or profession in which he is to engage. With reference to animals, the word is used in the narrowest sense of training in useful or amusing acts or habits.

By wardship the most part of noble men and gentlemen within this Realm have been brought up ignorantly and void of good education.

Quoted in Book of Privileges (E. F. T. S., extra ser.), [Forewords, p. ix]

To love her was a liberal education. Steele, Tatler, No. 49.

Is there no danger of their neglecting or rejecting altogether those opinions of which they have heard so little during the whole course of their education?

Hume, Dial. concerning Natural Religion, I.

But education, in the true sense, is not mere instruction in Latin, English, French, or history. It is the unfolding of the whole human nature. It is growing up in all things to our highest possibility.

J. F. Clarke, Self Culture, p. 30.

2. The rearing of animals, especially bees, silkworms, or the like; culture, as of bacteria in experimenting; a brood or collection of cultivated creatures. [Recent, from French use.]

If they [silkworm moths] were free from disease, then a crop was sure; if they were infected, the education would surely fail. . . . Small educations, reared apart from the ordinary magnanerie, . . . were recommended.

Engel, Hist., XXXI. 60.

Bureau of Education, an office of the United States government, forming a part of the Department of the Interior, and charged with the promotion of the cause of education through the collection and diffusion of statistical and other information. It originated in 1867. Its head is called the Commissioner of Education. = Syn. Training, Discipline, etc. (see instruction); breeding, schooling.

educator (ed'ū-kā-tor), n. [= F. éducateur = Sp. educador = It. educatore, < L. educator, a rearing, foster-father, later a tutor, pedagogue, < educare, bring up, rear, educate: see educate.] One who or that which educates; specifically, one who makes a business or a special study of education; a teacher or instructor.

Give me leave . . . to lay before the educators of youth these few following considerations. South, Works, V. 1.

Trade, that pride and darling of our ocean, that educator of nations, that benefactor in spite of itself, ends in shameful defaulting, bubble and bankruptcy, all over the world. Emerson, Works and Days.

educer (ē-dūs'), v. t.; pret. and pp. educated, ppr. educing. [= Sp. educir = Pg. educir = It. educere, < L. educere, bring out, etc., < e, out, + ducere, lead, draw: see educt, and cf. educate, adduce, conduce, induce, produce, etc.] 1. To draw out; extract, in a literal or physical sense.

Why pluck you not the arrow from his side? We cannot, lady

St. No mean, then, doctor, rests there to educer it? Chapman, Gentleman Usher, IV. 1.

2. To lead or bring out; cause to appear or be manifested; bring into view or operation; evoke.

The eternal art educing good from ill.

Pope, Essay on Man, II. 176.

Yet has the wondrous virtue to educer

From emptiness itself a real use.

Cowper, Hops, I. 155.

In divine things the task of man is not to create or to acquire, but to educer.

Lecky, Europ. Morals, I. 347.

educible (ē-dū'si-bil'), a. [educer + -ible.] Capable of being educated.

educt (ē'dukt'), n. [= F. educt; < L. eductum, noun, of eductus, pp. of educere, lead out: see educer.] 1. That which is educed; extracted matter; specifically, something extracted unchanged from a substance. [Rare.]

The volatile oils which pre-exist in cells, in the fruit and other parts of plants, and oil of sweet almonds obtained by pressure, are educts; while oil of bitter almonds, which does not pre-exist in the almond, but is formed by the action of emulsion and water on amygdalin, is a product.

Chamber's Encyc.

2. Figuratively, anything educed or drawn from another; an inference. [Rare.]

The latter are conditions of, the former are educts from, experience.

St. W. Hamilton.

3. In math., an expression derived from another expression of which it is a part.

education (ē-dū'kā'shon), n. [= Sp. educación = Pg. educção, < L. educatio (> n), < educere, pp. eductus, draw out: see educer.] The act of educating; a leading or drawing out.

education-pipe (ē-dū'kā'shon-pip), n. In steam-engines, the pipe by which the exhaust-steam from the cylinder is led into the condenser or allowed to escape into the atmosphere.

education-port (ē-dū'kā'shon-pōrt), n. An opening for the passage of steam in a steam-engine from the valves to the condenser; the exhaust-port.

education-valve (ē-dū'kā'shon-valv), n. A valve through which a fluid is discharged or exhausted: as, the exhaust- or education-valves of the steam-engine.

eductive (ē-dū'ktiv), a. [L. eductus, pp. of educere, draw out (see educer), + -ive.] Tending to educer or draw out. Boyle.

eductor (ē-dū'ktor), n. [L. eductor (only as equiv. to L. educator), < L. educere, draw out.] That which brings forth, elicits, or extracts. [Rare.]

stimulus must be called an eductor of vital ether. Dr. K. Darwin.

edulcorant (ē-dū'kō-rant), a. and n. [L. as if edulcorant* (> Sp. edulcorante, sweeten: see edulcorate.] 1. a. In med., sweetening, or rendering less acid.

II. n. A drug intended to render the fluids of the body less acid.

edulcorate (ē-dū'kō-rāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. edulcorated, ppr. edulcorating. [L. as if edulcoratus*, pp. of edulcorare* (> F. edulcorer = Pg. edulcorar, sweeten), < e, out, + L. dulcorare, sweeten: see dulcorate.] 1. To remove acidity from; sweeten.

Sucory, a little edulcorated with sugar and vinegar, is by some eaten in the summer, and more grateful to the stomach than the palate.

Keslyn, Acetaria.

2. In chem., to free from acids, salts, or impurities by washing.

The copious powder that results from their union is, by that union of volatile parts, so far fixed that, after they have edulcorated it with water, they prescribe the catching of it in a crucible for five or six hours.

Boyle, Works, IV. 311.

edulcoration (ē-dul-kō-rā-shōn), n. [= F. edulcoration = Fig. edulcoratio; as edulcorate + -ion.] 1. The act of sweetening by admixture of some saccharine substance. — 2. In chem., the act of sweetening or rendering more mild or pure by freeing from acid or saline substances, or from any soluble impurities, by repeated affusions of water.

edulcorative (ē-dul-kō-rā-tiv), a. [< edulcorate + -ive.] Having the quality of sweetening or purifying; edulcorant.

edulcorator (ē-dul-kō-rā-tor), n. One who or that which edulcorates; specifically, in chem., a contrivance formerly used for supplying small quantities of water to test-tubes, watch-glasses, etc.

edulous (ē-du'li-us), a. [< L. edulus, eatables, food (rare sing. edulum, > It. edulio, prop. pl. of edule (> Fig. edulo), neut. of adj. edulus, eatable, < edere = E. eat.] Edible; eatable.

Edwardsia (ed-würd'zi-ā), n. [NL. (Quatre-fagos, 1842), named after Henri Milne-Edwards, a French naturalist.] A genus of sea-anemones, made type of the family Edwardsiidae. They are not fixed or attached, but live free in the sand, or, when young, are even free-swimming organisms. In the latter state they have been described as a different genus, Arachnactis. E. beaufortii is an example.

Edwardsiidae (ed-würd'zi-ā), n. pl. [NL. < Edwardsia + -idae.] A group of Actiniaria with eight septa. There are two pairs of directive septa, the remaining four septa being imparied. All the septa are furnished with reproductive organs. The tentacles are simple, and usually more numerous than the septa. The body wall is soft, and the column longitudinally sulcate, with eight invaginations.

edwite, v. t. [ME. edwiten, edwyten, < AS. edwitan (= OHG. itawizan, itawizon, MHG. itawizen = Goth. itawētan), reprove, < ed, back, + witan, blame; see wite, and cf. test, < AS. atwitan.] To reprove; rebuke.

The tyrant words that he warps was, "where is the bolle?"

His wif gan edwite hym the how wikkedlich he lyued.

Piers Plowman (B), v. 370.

edwite, n. [ME. edwite, edwyte, edwist, edwyt, < AS. edwit (= OHG. itawiz, itwiz, MHG. itawize, itwiz = Goth. itawēit), reprove, < edwitan, reprove; see edwite, v.] Reproach; blame.

ee (ē), n. [A dial. form of eye; see eye.] An eye. [Now chiefly Scotch.]

Fears for my Willie brought tears in my ee.

Burns, Wandering Willie.

ee. A common English digraph of Middle English origin, having now the sound of "long" e, namely, ē. In Middle English it was actually "double" e—that is, the long sound e corresponding to the short sound e, representing an Anglo-Saxon long e (ē), as in beet, geet, meel, brood, feed, etc., or an Anglo-Saxon e, as in geed, geet, deep, weert, etc., or ee, as in cheek, steep, leek, etc., or ee, as in bea, dear, deep, weep, weed, etc., such vowels or diphthongs becoming in later Middle English long e.

written either e or ee, and in early modern English spelled ee or ea, with some differentiation (see ea). In words of other than Anglo-Saxon origin ee has the same sound, except in a few words not completely Anglicized, as in matinee. Words of Oriental or other remote origin having the vowel i (pronounced ē) are often spelled with ee when turned into English form, as cheer, sultee, etc.

E. E. An abbreviation of errors excepted, a saving clause frequently placed at the foot of an account rendered. Also, in a fuller form, E. and O. E. (which see).

-ee¹. [Late ME. -e or -ee, < (OF. -e, fem. -ee, mod. F. (with a diacritical accent) -é, fem. -ée (pron. alike), < L. -atus, fem. -ata, pp. of verbs in -are, F. -er. Early ME. -e, -ee, from the same source, has usually become thoroughly Englished as -y, or -y; cf. arm-y, jur-y, jell-y, chim-n-y, journ-y, etc. See -ate¹, -ate¹, -y.] A suffix of French, or more remotely of Latin origin, ultimately the same as -ate¹ and -ed², forming the termination of the perfect passive participle, and indicating the object of an action. It occurs chiefly in words derived from old Law French or formed according to the analogy of such words, as in pay-ee, draw-ee, assign-ee, employ-ee, etc., denoting the person who is paid, drawn on, assigned to, employed, etc., as opposed to the agent in -or or -er (in legal use generally -or), as pay-er or pay-or, draw-er, assign-or, employ-er, etc.

-ee². [Of. dim. -ie, -y, and see -ee¹.] A diminutive termination, occurring in bootee, goatee, etc. The diminutive force is less obvious in settee, which may be regarded as a diminutive of settle.

eeef, a. A dialectal form of eath.

Howbeit to this date, the dregs of the old ancient Chaucer English are kept as well there (in Ireland) as in Fingall, as they terme . . . eade, eeth, or eeef.

Stanford, Description of Ireland, p. 11, in Holmsted.

eeek¹, v., adv., and conj. An obsolete form of eke.

eeek² (ēk), v. t. [A dial. var. of itch or yuck; see itch, yuck.] To itch. [Prov. Eng.]

eeeket, v., adv., and conj. An obsolete form of eke.

eel (ēl), n. [Early mod. E. also eel; < ME. el, ele, < AS. el = MD. ael, D. aal = Frick. el = MLG. al, el, Ld. al = OHG. MHG. al, G. aal = Teut. all = Sw. al = Norw. Dan. aal, an eel; perhaps orig. *Teut. agla (cf. L. anguilla = Gr. ἰχθυόειον, an eel), dim. of a supposed agi* = L. anguis = Gr. ἰχθυόειον, a snake, < agh*, angh*, choke, strangle; see anguish, anger¹, etc., Echis, Echidna.] 1. An elongated apodal fish of the family Anguillidae and genus Anguilla, of which there are several species. The body is very long and subcylindrical, covered with discrete minute elliptical scales, chiefly arranged diagonally to the axis and at right angles with one another, but immersed in the skin, and partly concealed by a slippery mucous coat. The head is somewhat depressed, and the lower jaw protuberant. The teeth are slender, conic, and crowded in small bands in both jaws and in a longitudinal band on the vomer. The dorsal, anal, and caudal fins are nearly uniform, and completely united into one, the dorsal beginning near the second third of the entire length of the body. The color is generally brownish or blackish, except on the belly, which is whitish or silvery. The females attain a considerably larger size than the males. The sexual organs are minute except in the breeding season, and sexual intercourse takes place in the sea. Young females ascend into fresh water, but the males remain in salt water, and have rarely been seen, and when full-grown the females return to the sea for sexual intercourse and spawning. Eels are of much economic importance, and objects of special fisheries. The common European species is Anquilla anquilla or A. vulgaris; the American is A. rostrata. See Anguilla, Anguillidae.

In that Ffome men fynden Eles of 80 Fete long and more.

Manderley, Travels, p. 161.

Is the adder better than the eel,
Because his painted skin contents the eye?

Shak., T. of the S., iv. 2.

It is agreed by most men that the eel is a most dainty fish.

I. Walton, Complete Angler, I. 23.

2. Any fish of the order Apodes or Symbranchu, of which there are many families and several hundred species.—3. Some fish resembling or likened to an eel; an anguilliform fish.—4. Some small nematoid or threadworm, as of the family Anguillulidae, found in vinegar, sour paste, etc. See ringar-eel, and cut under Nematoda. Blind eel, a bunch of eel-grass or marsh-grass. (Colloq. Chesapeake Bay, U. S.)—Electric eel, a remarkable fish, Electrophorus or Gymnatus electricus, of the family Electrophoridae, of a thick, eel-like form with a rounded, finless back, the vent at the throat, and the anal fin commencing behind it, of a brownish color above and whitish below. It has the power of giving along electric discharges at will. The shocks produced are often violent, and serve as a means both of offense and of defense. They are weakened by frequent repetitions. Its electrical apparatus consists of two pairs of longitudinal bodies between the skin and the muscles of the caudal region, one pair next to the back and one along the anal fin. This apparatus is divided into about 240 cells, and is supplied by over 300 nerves. The electric eel is the most powerful of electric fishes. It sometimes attains a length of over 6 feet. It inhabits the fresh waters of Brazil and Guiana.—Frog-nosed eel, an eel of the genus Synbranchus (which see); so called by fishermen. It is a deep-sea species, found off the Newfoundland banks, often burrowing in the halibut, whence the specific name S. parasiticus.—Salt eel. (a) An eel or an eel's skin prepared for use as a whip.

I'p betimes, and with my salt eel went down in the parlor, and there got my boy and did beat him till I was faine to take breath two or three times.

Pepys, Diary, April 24, 1668.

Hence—(b) A rope's end; a flogging. [Nautical slang.]

Trembling for fear,

Lost from Bridport they get such another salt eel

As brave Duncan prepared for Myneer.

Dublin, A Salt Eel for Myneer.

eel-basket (ēl'bās'ket), n. A basket for catching eels; an eel-pot.

eel-buck (ēl'buk), n. An eel-pot. [Great Britain.]

Eel bucks that are intended to catch the sharp-nosed or frog-mouthed eels are set against the stream, and are set at night, as those two descriptions of eels feed and run only at night.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXIX. 368.

eeleator, n. [E. dial.] A young eel. [Local, Eng. (Northumberland).]

Eel! 'Eeleator' cast your tail intiv a knot, and aw! throw you into the waater. Quoted in Brockett's Glossary.

eelfare (ēl'fär), n. [< eel + fare, a going. Hence by corruption elver, q. v.] 1. In the Thames valley, the migration of young eels up the river.—2. A fry or brood of eels. [Prov. Eng. in both senses.]

eel-fly (ēl'fi), n. A shad-fly. C. Hallock. [St. Lawrence river.]

eel-fork (ēl'fōrk), n. A pronged instrument for catching eels.

eel-gig (ēl'gig), n. Same as eel-spear.

eel-grass (ēl'grās), n. 1. A grass-like naiadaceous marine plant, Zostera marina. [U. S.]

The dull weed upholstered the decaying wharves, and the only freight that heaped them was the kelp and eel-grass left by higher floods. Lowell, Fireside Travels, p. 46.

2. The wild celery, Vallisneria spiralis.

eel-mother (ēl'muv'ēr), n. A viviparous fish, Zoarces viviparus, of an elongated eel-like form, often confounded with the eel.

eel-oil (ēl'oil), n. An oil obtained from eels, used in lubricating, and as a liniment in rheumatism, etc.

eel-pot (ēl'pot), n. 1. A kind of basket for catching eels, having fitted into the mouth a funnel-shaped entrance, like that of a wire mouse-trap, composed of flexible willow rods converging inward to a point, so that the eels can easily force their way in, but cannot escape. These baskets are usually attached to a framework of wood erected in a river, especially a tideway river, the large open end of each being opposed to the current of the stream. The eels are thus intercepted on their descent toward the brackish water, which takes place during the autumn. Eel-pots are used in various parts of the Thames in England. In Great Britain called eel-buck. 2. The homely ray, Raja maculata. [Local, Eng.]

eel-pont (ēl'pont), n. [*< ME. eleponte (not recorded), < AS. ælepute (= OD. ælpuyt, also puyt-ael, D. puttaal) (L. capito), < æt, eel, + pūta (only in this comp.), pont; see pont¹.] 1. The conger-eel or lamp-eel, Zoarces anguillaris, of North America. See lamp-eel.—2. A local English name of the eel-mother or viviparous blenny, Zoarces viviparus.—3. A local English name of the hurbot, Lota vulgaris.

eel-punt (ēl'punt), n. A flat-bottomed boat used in fishing for eels.

eel-set (ēl'set), n. A peculiar kind of net used in catching eels.

In Norfolk, where immense quantities of eels are caught every year, the capture is mostly effected by eel-sets, which are nets set across the stream, and in which the sharp-nosed eel is the one almost invariably taken.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXIX. 288.

eel-shaped (ēl'shāpt), a. Like an eel in shape, long and slender; specifically, anguilliform.

eel-shark (ēl'shārk), n. A shark of the family Cetorhinchidae.

eel-spear (ēl'shēr), n. An eel-spear.

celakip (ēl'ākin), n. The skin of an eel. Eel-skins are used—(a) to cover a squid or artificial bait for

Edwardsia beaufortii about natural size.

Electric Eel (Electrophorus electricus).

effectation (e-fek'shon), n. [= F. effectio, < L. effectio (n-), a doing, effecting, < efficere, pp. effectus, effect; see effect, v.] 1. The act of effecting; creation; production.

But going further into particulars, [Plato] falls into conjectures, attributing the effecting of the soul unto the Great God, but the fabrication of the body to the Diex Dio, or Angels. Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 290.

2. In geom., the construction of a proposition. [Rare in both uses.] Geometrical effectation, a geometrical problem deducible from some general proposition.

effective (e-fek'tiv), a. and n. [= D. effectus = G. effectivus = Dan. Sw. effektiv, < F. effectif = Pr. effectivo = Sp. efectivo = It. effettivo, < L. effectivus, < L. effectus, pp. of efficere, effect; see effect, v.] 1. a. 1. Serving to effect the intended purpose; producing the intended or expected effect or result; operative; efficacious; as, an effective cause; effective proceedings.

Though theaters were forbidden, after the year 1574, to be open on the sabbath, the prohibition does not appear to have been effective during the reign of Elizabeth. Whipple, Ess. and Rev., II. 16.

2. Capable of producing effect; fit for action or duty; adapted for a desired end; as, the effective force of an army or of a steam-engine is so much; effective capacity.

Is there not a manifest inconsistency in devolving upon the federal government the care of the general defence, and leaving in the state governments the effective powers by which it is to be provided for?

A. Hamilton, Federalist, No. xxiii.

3. Serving to impress or affect with admiration; producing a decided impression of beauty or a feeling of admiration at the first presentation; impressive; striking; specifically, artistically strong or successful; as, an effective performance; an effective picture.

Nothing can be more effective than the ancient gold which . . . covers the walls of . . . St. Sophia of Kiev, the largest of the ancient Russian cathedrals.

A. J. C. Hare, Russia, ix.

The church of Sebelien is, both inside and out, not only a most remarkable, but a thoroughly effective building.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 93.

4. Actual; real. [A. Gallicism.] The Chinese, whose effective religion, practised at much cost and with great apparent sincerity, is now, as it has been from the earliest times, ancestor worship.

Quarterly Rev., CLXII. 101.

Effective component of a force. See component. Effective force. See force. Effective money, coin, in contradistinction to depreciable paper money. Effective scale of intercalations, in math., the series of real roots of two functions of x written in order of magnitude after repeated processes of removing pairs of roots belonging, each pair, to either one function, so that the roots of the two functions follow each other alternately.

Syn. Effective, Efficient, Efficacious, Effectual, are not altogether the same in meaning, all imply an object aimed at, and generally a specific object. Effective and efficient are used chiefly where the object is physical. Effective is applied to that which has the power to produce an effect or some effect, or which actually produces or helps to produce some effect; as, the army numbered ten thousand effective men; the bombardment was not very effective; effective revenue. Effective is most clearly separated from the others when representing the power to do, even when that power is not actually in use. Efficient seems the most active of these words; a person is very efficient when very helpful in producing desired results; an efficient cause is one that actually produces a result. Effective and efficient may freely be applied to persons; the others less so. Efficacious is essentially only a stronger word for efficient; as, an efficacious remedy; efficient would not be appropriate with remedy, as implying too much of self-directed activity in the remedy. Effectual, with reference to a result, implies that it is decisive or complete; an effectual stop or cure finishes the business, rendering further work unnecessary.

Precision is the most effective test of affected style as distinct from genuine style. A. Phelps, Ess. Style, p. 115.

The rarity of the visits of efficient bees to this exotic plant [Pisonia Sativum] is, I believe, the chief cause of the varieties so seldom intercrossing.

Washington, Address to Congress, Jan. 8, 1790.

II. n. Milit. (a) The number of men actually doing duty, or the strength of a company, a regiment, or an army, in the field or on parade.

By the last law which passed the Reichstag with such difficulty the peace effective was increased by about 42,000 men.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 17.

(b) A soldier fit for duty.

Nevertheless he assembled his army, 20,000 effectives.

The Century, XIX. 615.

effectively (e-fek'tiv-ly), adv. 1. With effect; powerfully; with real operation; completely; thoroughly.

And that thing which maketh a man lose the law of God, doth make a man righteous, and justifieth him effectively and actually.

Tyndale, Works, p. 325.

People had been dismissed the camp effectively, finally and with no possibility of return; but this was the first time that anybody had then introduced ab initio.

First Harle, Luck of Roaring Camp.

2. Actually; in fact. [A. Gallicism.] effectiveness (e-fek'tiv-nē), n. The quality of being effective. Syn. Effectiveness, Efficiency, Efficacy, Effectualness. The same differences obtain among these words as among effective, efficient, efficacious, and effectual. (See comparison under effective.) Effectualness is less often used, on account of its awkwardness.

effectless (e-fek'tles), a. [< effect + -less.] Without effect or result; useless; vain.

Sure all's effectless, yet nothing we'll omit

That bears recovery's name. Shak., Pericles, v. 1.

effector (e-fek'tor), n. [= It. effettore, < L. effector, < efficere, pp. effectus, effect; see effect, v.] See effector.

effector (e-fek'tres), n. [< effector + -ess.] A woman who effects or does. [Rare.]

A Chappell dedicated to the Virgin Mary, . . . reputed an effector of miracles.

Sandys, Travels, p. 7.

effectual (e-fek'tū-al), a. [= Sp. effectual (obs.) = It. effettuale, < *ML. effectualis (in adv. effectualiter), < L. effectus (effectu-), an effect; see effect, n.] 1. Producing an effect, or the effect desired or intended; also, loosely, having adequate power or force to produce the effect; as, the means employed were effectual.

Their gifts and grants are thereby made effectual both to bar themselves from revocation, and to assure the right they have given.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 62.

The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man avails th much.

Jas., v. 16.

2. True; veracious.

Reprove my allegation, if you can; effectually (e-fek'tū-ly), adv. 1. In an effectual manner; with complete effect; so as to produce or secure the end desired; thoroughly; as, the city is effectually guarded.

Or else conclude my words effectual.

Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 1.

Effectual adjudication, calling, demand, etc. See the nouns. Syn. L. Efficacious, Effectual, etc. (see effective), efficient, successful, complete, thorough.

The Poet with that same kind of delight, doth draw the mind more effectually than any other Arts doth.

Sir P. Sidney, Apol. for Poetrie.

I could see it [the story] visibly operate upon his countenance, and effectually interrupt his harangue.

Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, xvi.

2. Actually; in fact. [A. Gallicism.]

Although his charter can not be produced with the formalities used at his creation, . . . yet that he was effectually Earl of Cambridge by the existing evidence doth sufficiently appear.

Fulter, Hist. Cambridge Univ., I. 21.

effectualness (e-fek'tū-ness), n. The quality of being effectual. Syn. See effectiveness.

effectuate (e-fek'tū-it), v. t.: pret. and pp. effectuated, pp. effectuating. [*< ML. effectuatus, pp. of effectuare* (> It. effectuare = Sp. efectuar = Pg. efectuar = F. effectuer, > D. effectueren = G. effectueren = Dan. effectuere = Sw. effectuera), give effect to, < L. effectus (effectu-), effect; see effect, n.] To bring to pass; accomplish; achieve; effect.

He found him a most fit instrument to effectuate his desire.

Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, ii.

Where such an unexpected face appears
Of an amazed court, that gazing sat
With a dumb silence (seeming that it fears
The thing it went about) effectuate.

Daniel, Civil Wars, vi.

In political history it frequently occurs that the man who accidentally has effectuated the purpose of a party is immediately invested by them with all their favourite virtues.

J. D.Israeli, Curios. of Lit., III. 125.

effectuation (e-fek'tū-shon), n. [= Pg. efectuacion = It. effettuazione; as effectuate + -ion.] The act of effectuating, bringing to pass, or producing a result.

The ghostly or spiritual effectuation of natural occurrences has ever been and is still the mode of interpretation most readily seized upon by primitive thinking.

Mind, IX. 308.

First of all we must note the distinction of immanent action and transitive action; the former is what we call action simple, and implies only a single thing, the agent; the latter, which we might with advantage call effectuation, implies two things, i. e., a patient distinct from the agent.

J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 22.

effectuous (e-fek'tū-ōs), a. [*< L. as if effectuosus; see effectuosus.] Same as effectuosus.

effectuous (e-fek'tū-ōs), a. [< OF. effectuor, < *L. as if effectuosus, < effectus (effectu-), effect; see effect, n.] Having effect or force; forcible; efficacious; effective. B. Johnson.

For the contempt of the Gospel, shall the wrath of God suffer the Turk and the Pope with strong delusions and effectuous errors to destroy many souls and bodies.

Joys, Expos. of Daniel, xli.

Effectuous words and pithie in sense. Expresses of sensu tineta verba.

Berr, Alvearis, 1202.

effectuously (e-fek'tū-ōs-ly), adv. Effectually; effectively.

O my dear father, Master [attimer], that I could do something whereby I might effectuously utter my poor heart towards you!

J. Careless, in Bradford's Works (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 402.

effeir (e-fēr'), v. t. [Sc., also written effere, affere, after, < OF. afferer, afferer (= Pr. afferir; ML. reflex afferre), be suitable, convenient, < L. afferre, adferre, bring to, assist, be useful to: see affertent.] In Scots law, to be suitable, or belong.

In form as effeir, means such form as in law belongs to the thing.

Bell.

The Baron of Avenel never rides with fewer than ten jack men at his back, and oftener with fifty, bodie [furnished] in all that effere to war as if they were to do battle for a kingdom.

Scott, Monastery, xxiii.

effeir (e-fēr'), n. [Sc., also written effere, affere, etc.; < effeir, v.] 1. That which belongs or is becoming to one's rank or station.

Only could they not have honest weeds [proper clothes] To their estate don'd effeir!

Makland, Poems, p. 322.

2. Property; quality; state; condition.

Than callit scho all flouris that grow on feld,
Discreyving all their fassions and effeir.

Dunbar, Bannatyne Poems, p. 2.

Effeir of war, warlike guise.

effeminacy (e-fem'i-nā-si), n. [< effeminate; see effeminate.] The state or quality of being effeminate; feminine delicacy or weakness; want of manliness; womanishness; commonly applied, in reproach, to men exhibiting such a character.

He tells me, speaking of the horrid effeminacy of the King, that the King hath taken ten times more care and pains in making friends between my Lady Castlemaine and Mrs. Stewart, when they have fallen out, than ever he did to save his kingdom.

Pepps, Diary, III. 168.

The physical organization of the Bengalee is feeble even to effeminacy.

Mazanday, Warren Hastings.

Bacchus nurtured by a girl, and with the soft, delicate limbs of a woman, was the type of a disgraceful effeminacy.

Lecky, Rationalism, I. 243.

But foul effeminacy held me yoked
Her bond slave.

Milton, S. A., I. 410.

effeminate (e-fem'i-nāt), v. t.: pret. and pp. effeminated, ppr. effeminating. [< L. effeminatus, pp. of effeminare (> It. effeminare, effeminare = Sp. of effeminar (obs.) = Pg. effeminar = Pr. effeminar = F. effeminer), make womanish, < ex, out, + femina, a woman; see feminine.] 1. trans. To make womanish; unmanly; weaken.

More resolute courages, then the Persians or Indians, effeminated with wealth & peace, could afford.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 302.

And then dost nourish him a lock of hair behind like a girl, effeminating thy son even from the very cradle.

Eclym, Golden Book of Chrysostome.

Thou art as hard to shake off as that flattering effeminating Mischief, Love.

Wycherley, Plain Dealer, III. 1.

II. intrans. To grow womanish or weak; melt into weakness.

In a slothful peace, both courages will effeminate, and manners corrupt.

Bacon, True Greatness of Kingdoms and Estates (ed. 1887).

effeminate (e-fem'i-nāt), a. [= F. effemine = Pg. effeminado = It. effeminato, effeminato, < L. effeminatus, pp. of the verb.] 1. Having the qualities of the female sex; soft or delicate to an unmanly degree; womanish; applied to men.

The king, by his voluptuous life and mean marriage, became effeminate and less sensible of honour.

Bacon.

A woman impudent and manifold grown
Is not more loath'd than an effeminate man.

Shak., T. and C., III. 2.

I have heard sometimes men of reputed ability join in with that effeminate plaintive tone of invective against critics.

Shakespeare, Mac., III. 1.

Be manly then, though mild, for, sure as fate,
Thou art, my Stephen, too effeminate.

Crabbe, Works, V. 240.

2. Characterized by or resulting from effeminacy; as, an effeminate peace; an effeminate life.

Soldiers.

Should not affect, methinks, strains so effeminate.

Ford, Broken Heart, III. 2.

3. Womanlike; tender.

As well we know your tenderness of heart;
And gentle, kind, effeminate remorse.

Shak., Rich. III., III. 7.

Syn. Womanish, etc. (see feminine), weak, unmanly.

effeminately (e-fem'i-nāt-ly), adv. In an effeminate manner; womanishly; weakly.

With golden pendants in his ears,
Aloft the silken reins he bears,
Proud, and effeminately gay.

Pope, tr. of Anacreon's Odes, lxi.

Effeminately vanquish'd: by which means
Now blind, dishearten'd, shamed, effeminately quell'd,
To what can I be useful?

Milton, S. A., I. 322.

effeminateness (e-fem'i-nā-tē-ness), n. The state of being effeminate; unmanly softness.

The indulgent softness of the parent's family is apt, at last, to give young persons a most unhappy effeminateness. Secter, Works, I. 1.

effemination (e-fem-i-nā'shən), n. [= F. effemination = Pg. effeminación = It. effeminazione, < L. effeminatio (n.), < L. effeminare, pp. effeminatus, make womanish: see effeminate, v.] The state of being or the act of making effeminate.

But from this mixture of sexes . . . degenerate effemination. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., viii. 17.

effeminize (e-fem'i-nīz), v. t. [As effemin-ate + -ize.] To make effeminate.

Brave knights effeminized by sloth.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas.

effendi (e-fen'di), n. [Turk. efendi, a gentleman, a master (of servants), a patron, protector, a prince of the blood (efendim, 'my master,' in address equiv. to E. sir), < NGr. ἀφέντης (pron. āfen-dēs), a lord, master, a vernacular form of Gr. (also NGr.) αὐθιρυγ (in NGr. pron. āfthen-dēs), an absolute master: see authentic.] A title of respect given to gentlemen in Turkey, equivalent to Mr. or sir, following the name when used with one.

I assumed the polite and pliant manners of an Indian physician, and the dress of a small Effendi, still, however, representing myself to be a Dervish.

R. F. Burton, El-Medīnah, p. 12.

efferation, n. [< L. effertus (n.), a making wild or savage, < L. efferrare, pp. efferratus, make wild or savage, < efferus, very wild, fierce, savage: see efferus.] A making wild.

effert (ef'g-rnt), a. and n. [= F. effert, < L. effertus (n.), ppr. of efferre, efferre, bring or carry out, < ex, out, + ferre = E. bear.] I. a. Conveying outward or away; deferent: as, the effert nerves, which convey a nervous impulse from the ganglionic center outward to the muscles or other active tissue. In the system of blood vessels the arteries are the effert vessels, conveying blood from the heart to all parts of the body, while the veins are the affert vessels, bringing blood to the heart. In any gland or glandular system the vessel which takes up and carries off a secretion is effert. Effert duct. Same as deferent canal (which see, under deferent).

II. n. 1. In anat. and physiol., a vessel or nerve which conveys outward.—2. A river flowing from and bearing away the waters of a lake.

effertus (ef'g-rus), a. [< L. effertus, very wild, fierce, savage, < ex (intensive) + ferus, wild, fierce: see fierce.] Very wild or savage; fierce; ferocious: as, an effertus beast.

From the teeth of that effertus beast, from the fang of the wild boar.

Sp. King, Vitis Palatina, p. 34.

effervesce (ef'er-ves'), v. i.; pret. and pp. effervesced, ppr. effervescing. [< L. effervesco, boil up, foam up, < ex, out, + fervere, begin to boil, < ferre, boil: see ferent.] 1. To be in a state of natural ebullition, like liquor when gently boiling; bubble and hiss, as fermenting liquors or any fluid when some part escapes in a gaseous form; work, as new wine.

The compound spirit of nitre, put to oil of cloves will effervesce, even to a flame.

Meat, Poisons.

2. Figuratively, to show signs of excitement; exhibit feelings which cannot be suppressed: as, to effervesce with joy.

Have I proved

That Revelation old and new admits
The natural man may effervesce in ire,
O'erflooded rage, o'erflooded heaven with foamy rage,
At the first pangure to his self respect?

Browning, King and Book, II. 85.

Effervescing draught. See draught.
effervescence, effervescency (ef'er-ves'ens, -en-si), n. [= F. effervescence = Sp. efervescencia = Pg. effervescencia = It. effervescenza, < L. effervescentia (n.), ppr. of effervesco.] 1. Natural ebullition; that commotion of a fluid which takes place when some part of the mass flies off in a gaseous form, producing small bubbles: as, the effervescence or working of new wine, cider, or beer; the effervescence of a carbonate with nitric acid, in consequence of chemical action and decomposition producing carbon dioxide or carbonic-acid gas.—2. Figuratively, strong excitement; manifestation of feeling.

The wild gas, the fixed air, is plainly broke loose: but we ought to suspend our judgment until the first effervescence is a little subsided.

Burke, Rev. in France.

We postpone our literary work until we have more ripe news and skill to write, and we one day discover that our literary talent was a youthful effervescence which we have now lost.

Emerson, Old Age.

—Syn. See ebullition. effervescent (ef'er-ves'ent), a. [= F. effervescent = Sp. efervesciente = Pg. It. effervescente, < L. effervescentia (n.), ppr. of effervesco, boil up:

see effervescence.] Effervescing; having the property of effervescence; of a nature to effervesce.
effervescible (ef'er-ves'i-bl), a. [< effervesce + -ible.] Capable of effervescing.

A small quantity of effervescible matter.

Kirwan.

effervescive (ef'er-ves'iv), a. [< effervesce + -ive.] Producing or tending to produce effervescence: as, an effervescive force.

[Rare.]
effet (ef'et), n. A dialectal form of efft.

effete (e-fet'), a. [Formerly also efate; < L. effetus, improp. effatus, that has brought forth, exhausted by bearing, worn out, effete, < ex, out, + fetus, that has brought forth: see fetus.] 1. Past bearing; functionless, as a result of age or exhaustion.

It is . . . probable that the females as well of beasts as birds have in them . . . the seeds of all the young they will afterwards bring forth, which . . . all spent and exhausted, . . . the animal becomes barren and effete.

Rus. Works of Creation, I.

Hence—2. Having the energies worn out or exhausted; become incapable of efficient action; barren of results.

All that can be allowed him now is to refresh his decayed, effete sensuality with the history of his former life.

South, Sermons.

If they find the old governments effete, worn out, they may seek new ones.

Buckle.

Islamism . . . as a proselyting religion . . . has long been practically effete.

Quarterly Rev., CLXIII. 141.

—Syn. 1. Unproductive, unfruitful, unprofitable. 2. Spent, worn out.

effetness (e-fet'nes), n. The state of being effete; exhaustion; barrenness.

What would have been the result to mankind . . . if the hope of the world's rejuvenescence had been met solely by that effetness of corruption the old Roman empire?

Buckle, Civilization, I. 291.

efficacious (ef-i-ka'shus), a. [< OF. efficacious, equiv. to efficace, F. efficace = Pr. efficace = Sp. eficaz = Pg. eficaz = It. efficace, < L. efficax (a.), efficacious, < efficere, effect, accomplish, do: see effect, v.] Producing the desired effect; having power adequate to the purpose intended; effectual in operation or result.

The mode which he adopted was at once prudent and efficacious.

Bachman, Ingoldsbay Legends, I. 82.

He knew his Rome: what wheels we set to work,
Piled influential folk, pressed to the car
Of the efficacious purple.

Browning, King and Book, I. 144.

—Syn. Efficient, Effectual, etc. (see effective), active, operative, energetic.

efficaciously (ef-i-ka'shus), adv. In an efficacious manner; effectually.

It (torment) does so efficaciously convince
That . . . out of each hundred cases, by my count, Never I knew of patients beyond four Who stand its taste.

Browning, King and Book, II. 74.

efficaciousness (ef-i-ka'shus-nes), n. The quality of being efficacious; efficiency.

The efficaciousness of these means is sufficiently known and acknowledged.

Giddings, The Bee, No. 5.

efficacy (ef-i-ka-si), n. [= F. efficace = Pr. efficace = Sp. eficaz = Pg. It. efficace, < L. efficax (a.), efficacious, < efficere, effect, accomplish, do: see effect, v.] The quality of being efficacious or effectual; production of, or the capacity of producing, the effect intended or desired; effectiveness.

This hath ever made me suspect the efficacy of riches.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, I. 25.

Plumatory motions, and aspects
In sextile, square, and trine, and opposite Of noxious efficacy.

Milton, P. L., x. 620.

Even were Gray's claims to being a great poet rejected he can hardly be classed with the many who regard and form are the efficacy of his phrase and the music to which he sets it.

John H. New Princeton Rev., I. 177.

—Syn. Efficacy, etc. (see effectiveness), virtue, force, energy.

efficiency (e-fish'ens), n. Same as efficacy.
efficiency (e-fish'en-si), n. [< Sp. eficiencia = Pg. eficiencia = It. efficienza, < L. efficiētia (n.), ppr. of efficio, effect, accomplish, do: see effect, v.] The quality of being efficient; effectual agency; competent power; the quality or power of producing desired or intended effects.

The manner of this divine efficiency being far above us.

Hooder, Lectures, Polity.

Truth is properly no more than contemplation, and by utmost efficiency is but teaching.

Milton, Eikonoklastes, xxxiv.

Causes which should carry in their mere statement evidence of their efficiency.
Specifically—(a) The state of being able or competent, the state of possessing or having acquired adequate knowledge or skill in any art, profession or duty, as, by patient perseverance he has attained a high degree of efficiency. (b) In such the ratio of the useful work performed by a prime motor to the energy expended.—Syn. Efficacy, etc. See effectiveness.

efficient (e-fish'ent), a. and n. [= F. efficient = Pr. eficiente = Sp. eficiente = Pg. It. efficiente, < L. efficiens (n.), ppr. of efficere, effect, accomplish, etc.: see effect, v.] I. a. 1. Producing outward effects; of a nature to produce a result; active; causative.

If one flower is fertilised with pollen which is more efficient than that applied to the other flowers on the same peduncle, the latter often drop off.

Darwin, Cross and Self Fertilisation, p. 309.

2. Acting or able to act with due effect; adequate in performance; bringing to bear the requisite knowledge, skill, and industry; capable; competent: as, an efficient workman, director, or commander.

Every healthy and efficient mind passes a large part of life in the company most easy to him.

Emerson, Clubs.

Efficient cause, a cause which brings about something external to itself: distinguished from material and formal cause by being external to that which it causes, and from the end or final cause in being that by which something is made or done, and not merely that for the sake of which it is made or done. The conception of efficient cause antedates that of physical force in the Aristotelian scheme; and the latter finds no place in the Aristotelian division of causes. But many writers of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries extend the meaning of efficient cause to include force. Other and inferior writers, since the Aristotelian philosophy has ceased to form an essential part of a liberal education, use the phrase efficient cause in imitation of older writers, but without any distinct apprehension of its meaning, probably in the sense of effective cause (see the citation from Lecky, below.) Efficient cause are traditionally divided into various classes: 1st, into active and passive, thus, fire is said to be the active cause of its own heat and the passive cause of heat in other bodies; 2d, into immanent and transient, an immanent cause brings about some modification of itself (it is, nevertheless, regarded as external, because it does not produce itself); 3d, into free and necessary, 4th, into cause by itself and cause by accident, thus, if a man in digging a well finds a treasure, he is the cause per se of the well being dug and the cause by accident of the discovery of the treasure; 5th, into absolute and independent, the latter being again divided into principal and secondary, and secondary into procatartical, preterminal, and instrumental (the procatartical extrinsically excites the principal cause to action, the preterminal internally disposes the principal cause to action); 6th, into first and second; 7th, into universal and particular; 8th, into proximate and remote. Medical men follow Galen in dividing the efficient causes of disease into predisposing, exciting, and determining.

Every politician knew that the interference of the sovereign during the debate in the House of Lords was the efficient cause of the change of ministry.

Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., xv.

Syn. Efficacious, Effectual, etc. (see effective); energetic, operative, active, ready, helpful.

II. n. 1. An efficient cause (see above).
God, which moveth more natural agents as an efficient only, doth otherwise move intellectual creatures, and especially his holy angels.

Hooder, Lectures, Polity, I. 4.

Excepting God, nothing was before it: and therefore it could have no efficient in nature.

Bacon, Physical Tables, viii. 1.

O, but, say such, had not a woman been the temple and efficient to our fall, we had not needed a redemption.

Psalm, Honour Triumphant, I.

Some are without efficient, as God.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, I. 14.

2. One who is efficient or qualified; specifically, in the volunteer service of Great Britain, one who has attended the requisite number of drills, and in respect of whom the corps receives the capitulation grant paid by government.—3. In math., a quantity multiplied by another quantity to produce the quantity of which it is said to be an efficient; a factor. Extra efficient, a commissioned officer or sergeant of volunteers in the British army who has obtained an official certificate of competency. Extra efficient earn an extra grant for their company.

efficiently (e-fish'ent-ly), adv. In an efficient manner; effectively.

God, when He is styled Father, must always be understood to be a true and proper cause, really and efficiently giving life.

Clarke, The Trinity, B. 1, § 13, note.

effigiate (e-fish'at), v. t.; pret. and pp. effigiated, ppr. effigiating. [< L. effigatus, pp. of effigere, form, fashion, represent: see effigy.] A fashioning; a representation. Bailey, 1727.
effierce (e-fier'), v. t. [< ex + fierce, after L. efferrare, make fierce, < efferus, very fierce: see efferus.] To make fierce or furious.

With fell words as he effierced was,
And wilfully him throwing on the grass Told beat and blame his head and breast, full worn.

Spenser, F. Q., III. xi. 27.

effigial (e-fish'ial), a. [< F. effigial; as effig, + al.] Pertaining to or exhibiting an effigy.

effigy. To make into an effigy of something; form into a like figure. [Rare.]

He who means to win souls . . . must, as St. Paul did, effigiate and conform himself to those circumstances of living and discourse by which he may prevail. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1836), I. 754.

effigiation (e-fij-i-ā-shun), n. [< effigiate + -ion.] 1. The act of forming in resemblance. Bailey, 1727. [Rare.]—2. That which is formed in resemblance; an image or effigy. [Rare.]

No such effigiation was therein discovered, which some nineteen weeks after became visible. Fuller, Ch. Hist., X. li. 53.

effigies (e-fij-i-ōz), n. [L.: see effigy.] An effigy.

This same Dagoberta monument I saw there, and under his Effigies this Epitaph. Coryat, Crudities, I. 46.

We behold the species of eloquence in our minds, the effigies or actual image of which we seek in the organs of our hearing. Dryden, tr. of Du Fresnoy's Art of Painting effigurate (e-fij-ū-rāt), a. [< L. ex, out, + figuratus, pp. of figurare, figure, < figura, a figure: see figurate.] In bot., having a definite form or figure: applied to lichens: opposed to effuse.

effigy (e-fij-i-jī), n.; pl. effigies (-jiz). [Formerly also effigie, and, as L., effigies; = F. effigie = Sp. effigie = It. effigie, < L. effigies, effigia, a copy or imitation of an object, an image, likeness, < effingere, pp. effictus, form, fashion, represent, < ex, out, + fingere (fig.), form: see sign, fiction.] A representation or imitation of any object, in whole or in part; an image or a representation of a person, whether of the whole figure, the bust, or the head alone; a likeness in sculpture, painting, or drawing; a portrait: most frequently applied to the figures on sepulchral monuments, and popularly to figures made up of stuffed clothing, etc., to represent obnoxious persons.

Effigy.—Bene in West Lynn Church, Norfolk, England

A choice library, over which are the effigies of most of our latecomers of polite literature.

Keelyn, Diary, Nov. 21, 1844.

The abbey church of St. Denis possesses the largest collection of French 13th century monumental effigies.

Encyc. Brit., XXI. 681

A chair of state was placed on it, and in this was seated an effigy of King Henry, clad in sable robes and adorned with all the insignia of royalty. Prescott, Ferd. and Is., I. 3.

To burn or hang in effigy, to burn or hang an image or a picture (of a person), either as a substitute for actual burning or hanging (formerly practised by judicial authorities as a vicarious punishment of a condemned person who had escaped their jurisdiction), or, as at the present time, as an expression of dislike, hatred, or contempt: a mode in which public antipathy or indignation is often manifested.

This night the youths of the City burnt the Pope in effigy. Reelyn, Diary, Nov. 5, 1673.

effigatator (e-flaj-i-tāt), v. t. [< L. effigatator, pp. of effigatari, demand urgently, < ex (intensive) + agitare, demand.] To demand earnestly. Coles, 1717.

efflate (e-flāt'), v. t.; pret. and pp. efflated, pp. efflating. [< L. efflatus, pp. of efflare, blow or breathe out, < ex, out, + flare = F. blow.] To fill with breath or air; inflate. [Rare.]

Our common spirits, efflated by every vulgar breath upon every act, delly themselves.

Sir T. Herbert, Travels in Africa, p. 139

efflation (e-flā'shon), n. [= OF. efflation, < L. as if efflatio(n)*, < efflare, pp. efflatus, blow or breathe out: see efflate.] The act of breathing out or puffing; a puff, as of wind.

A soft efflation of celestial fire Came, like a rushing breeze, and shook the lyre. Paradise, Gift of Poetry effleurage (e-flō-rāzh'), n. [F., grazing, touching; < effleurir, graze, touch: see efflower.] Gentle superficial rubbing (of a patient) with the palm of the hand.

efflorescence (ef-lō-res'ens), v. i.; pret. and pp. effloresced, pp. efflorescing. [= Sp. efflorescer, < L. efflorescere, inceptive form (later in simple form, L.L. efflorere), blossom, < ex (intensive) + florere, blossom, flower, < flus (flor-), a flower: see flower.] 1. To burst into bloom, as a plant.

The Italian (Gothic architectural) effloresced . . . into the meaningless ornamentation of the Certosa of Pavia and the cathedral of Como. Ruskin.

2. To present an appearance of flowering or hydrating into bloom; specifically, to become covered with an efflorescence; become incrustated with crystals of salt or the like.

The walls of limestone caverns sometimes effloresce with nitrate of lime in consequence of the action of nitric acid formed in the atmosphere. Dana.

3. In chem., to change either throughout or over the surface to a whitish, mealy, or crystalline powder, from a gradual decomposition, on simple exposure to the air; become covered with a whitish crust or light crystallization, in the form of short threads or spicula, from a slow chemical change between some of the ingredients of the matter covered and an acid proceeding commonly from an external source.

As the surface [of a puddle of water] dries, the capillary action draws the moisture up pieces of broken earth, dead sticks, and tufts of grass, where the salt effloresces. Darwin, Geol. Observations, li. 307.

efflorescence (ef-lō-res'ens), n. [= F. efflorescence = Sp. efflorescencia = It. efflorescenza, < L. efflorescere (-s), pp. efflorescent.] 1. The act of efflorescing or blossoming out; also, an aggregation of blossoms, or an appearance resembling or suggesting a mass of flowers.

As the sky is supposed to scatter its golden star pollen once every year in meteoric showers, so the dome of St. Peter's has its annual efflorescence of fire. Lowell, Fireside Travels, p. 200.

2. In bot., the time or state of flowering; anthesis.—3. In med., a redness of the skin; a rash; eruption, as in measles, smallpox, scarlatina, etc.—4. In chem., the formation of small white threads or spicula, resembling the sublimated matter called flowers, on the surface of certain bodies, as salts, or on the surface of any permeable body or substance; the incrustation so formed.

efflorescency (ef-lō-res'en-si), n. 1. The state or condition of being efflorescent.—2. An efflorescence.

Two white, sparry incrustations, with efflorescences in form of shrubs, formed by the trickling of water. Woodward, Fossils.

efflorescent (ef-lō-res'ent), a. [= F. efflorescent = Sp. efflorescente = It. efflorescente, < L. efflorescere (-s), pp. efflorescere, blossom: see effloresce.] 1. Blooming; being in flower.—2. Apt to effloresce; subject to efflorescence: as, an efflorescent salt.—3. Covered or incrustated with efflorescence.

Yellow efflorescent sparry incrustations on stone.

Woodward, Fossils.

efflower (e-flou'er), v. t. [An erroneous accom. (as if < ex + flower) of F. efflower, graze, touch, touch upon, strip the leaves off, < ex for ex (< L. ex), out, + flur (in the phrase à fleur de, on a level with), < G. flur, plain, = F. floor.] In leather-manuf., to remove the outer surface of (a skin). See the extract.

The skins [of animals] are first washed, lined, fleeced, and branned . . . They are next efflowered—that is, deprived of their epidermis by a concave knife, blunt in its middle part—upon the convex horsebeam. Ure, Dict., III. 87.

effluence (ef-lū-gens), n. [= F. effluence = Sp. effluencia = It. effluencia, < *N.L. effluentia, < L. effluens (-s), flowing out: see effluent.] 1. The act of flowing out; outflow; emanation.—2. That which issues or flows out; an efflux; an emanation.

Bright effluence of bright essence increase.

Milton, P. L., III. 6.

From this bright Effluence of his Deed

They borrow that reflected Light

With which the lasting Lamp they feed

Prior, Carmen Seculare (1700), st. 35.

And, as if the gloom of the earth and sky had been but the effluence of these two mortal hearts, it vanished with their sorrow. Hawthorne, Scarlet Letter, xviii.

Grant that an unnamed virtue or delicate vital effluence is always ascending from the earth. The Atlantic, LVIII. 428.

effluency (ef-lū-en-si), n. Same as effluence.
effluent (ef-lū-ent), a. and n. [= F. effluent = Sp. effluente = It. effluente, < L. effluens (-s), pp. effluere, flow out, < ex, out, + fluere, flow: see fluent. Cf. affluent, influent, refluent, etc.] 1. a. Flowing out; emanating.

Dazzling the brightness; not the sun so bright.

Thus here the pure substantial form of light;

Shot from his hand and side in golden streams,

Came forward effluent horns, pointed beams.

Paradise, Gift of Poetry.

II. n. 1. That which flows out or issues forth.

A number of specimens of waste liquors from factories, with the residual matters pressed into cakes, and also of the purified effluents, are exhibited. Sci. Amer. Supp., No. 446.

2. Specifically, in geog., a stream that flows out of another stream or out of a lake: as, the Atchafalaya is an effluent of the Mississippi river.—3. In math., a covariant of a quantie of degree m in i variables, the covariant being of degree m and in p variables, where p is the number of permutations that can be obtained by dividing n into i parts. Sylvestre, 1853.

effluvia, n. Plural of effluvium.
effluvia (e-flū-vi-ā-bl), a. [< effluvium + -able.] 'Capable of being given off in the form of effluvium. [Rare.]

The great rapidness with which the wheels that serve to cut and polish diamonds must be moved does excite a great degree of heat . . . in the stone, and by that and the strong concussion it makes of its parts, may force it to spend its effluvia matter, if I may call it so. Boyle, Works, IV. 254.

effluvial (e-flū-vi-āl), a. [< effluvium + -al.] Pertaining to effluvia; containing effluvia.
effluvia (e-flū-vi-āl), v. t.; pret. and pp. effluviated, pp. effluviating. [< effluvium + -ate.] To throw off effluvium. [Rare.]

What an eminent physician, who was skilled in perfumes, affirmed to me about the durability of an effluviating power. Boyle, Works, V. 47.

effluvium (e-flū-vi-um), n.; pl. effluvia (-ā). [= F. effluve = Sp. effluvio = It. effluvio, < L. effluviū, a flowing out, an outlet, < effluere, flow out: see effluent.] A subtle or invisible exhalation; an emanation: especially applied to noxious or disagreeable exhalations: as, the effluvia from diseased bodies or putrefying animal or vegetable substances.

Besides its electric attraction, which is made by a sulphureous effluviū, it will strike fire upon percussion. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., li. 1.

efflux (ef-lūks), n. [= Sp. (obs.) efflujo = It. efflusso, < L. as if effluxus*, n., < effluere, pp. effluxus, flow out: see effluent.] 1. The act or state of flowing out or issuing in a stream; effusion; effluence; flow: as, an efflux of matter from an ulcer. The rate of efflux of a fluid is roughly calculated by Torricelli's theorem, that the velocity at the orifice is the same as if each particle had fallen freely from the level of the fluid in the vessel. But, owing to the converging motion, the area of the orifice is greater than the section of the stream, while the pressure is increased, so that the efflux is less than the amount given by Torricelli's theorem.

It is no wonder, if God can torment where we see no tormentor, and comfort where we behold no comforter; he can do it by immediate emanations from himself, by continual effluxes of those powers and virtues which he was pleased to implant in a weaker and fainter measure in created agents. South, Works, VIII. xiv.

2. That which flows out; an emanation, effusion, or effluence.

Prime cheerer, Light!

Of all material beings, first and best!

Efflux divine! Thomson, Summer, l. 92.

Whatever talents may be, if the man create not, the pure efflux of the deity is not his; clouds and smoke there may be, but not yet flame. Kierkegaard, Misc., p. 73.

Beryllus (who was a precursor of Apollinarianism) taught, that in the Person of Christ, after His nativity as Man, there was a certain efflux of the divine essence, so that He had no reasonable human soul. Bp. Chr. Wordsworth, Church Hist., I. 201.

efflux (e-fluks'), v. i. [< L. effluxus, pp.: see the noun.] To flow out or away.

Five years being effluxed, he took out the tree and weighed it. Boyle, Works, I. 493.

effluxion (e-fluk'shon), n. [= F. effluxion = Sp. (obs.) efflujo, < L. as if efflujo(n)* (NL. also sometimes spelled efflujo), < effluere, pp. effluxus, flow out: see efflux.] 1. The act of flowing out.—2. That which flows out; an emanation. [Rare.]

There are some light effluxions from spirit to spirit, when men are one with another; as from body to body. Bacon.

The effluxions penetrate all bodies, and like the species of visible objects are ever ready in the medium, and lay hold on all bodies proportionate or capable of their action. Sir T. Browne, Concerning the Generation.

effodient (e-fō-di-ent), a. [< L. effodien (-s), pp. effodire, effodire, dig out, dig up, < ex, out, + fodire, dig: see fossil.] In zool., habitually digging: fossorial; fodient.

Effodientia (e-fō-di-en'shi-ā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. effodien (-s), digging: see effodient.] A division of edentate mammals, including insectivorous forms, most of which are effodient or fossorial, as the armadillos, anteaters, sardvarks, and pangolins: a term now superseded by Fodientia, and restricted to the African fossorial ant-eaters, as the sardvarks.
effuter, a. An obsolete spelling of effuta.

Th' effluvia south
Warm the wide air, and o'er the void of heaven
Breathes the big clouds with vernal showers distent.
• Thomson, Spring 1 144.

This bird be a bank midith his nest,
And helpeth his crows and heath hen after.
Richard the Redeless, III. 42.
The largest Eggs, yet warm within their Nest,
Together with the Hens which laid 'em, drest.
Congreve, tr. of Juvenal's Satires, 31.

2. Something like or likened to an egg in shape.

There was taken a great glass bubble with a long neck, such as chymists are wont to call a philosophical egg. Boyle.
[The egg was used by the early Christians as a symbol of the hope of the resurrection. The use of eggs at Easter has, doubtless, reference to the same idea. Eggs of marble have been found in the tombs of early Christians.]
Alien egg. See alien. — Ante-egg. See ante. — Bad egg, a bad or worthless person. (Colloq.) — Coronate egg, costate egg. See the adjective. — Drappit egg. See drappit. — Eared egg. See eared. — Easter egg. See Easter. — Egg and anchor, egg and dart, egg and tongue, in arch., an egg-shaped ornament alternating with a dart-like ornament, used to enrich the ovolo mold.

Egg-and-dart Molding — Erechtheum, Athens

ing. It is also called the echinus ornament. See echinus.
4. The motive is of Hellenic origin, but has been a usual one from Hellenic times to the present day, though it has not preserved its Greek refinement. — Egg of the universe, in ancient Greek cosmogony, the sphere of the sky with its contents, segmented at the surface of the earth, and supposed to be an egg in process of incubation. — Egg Saturday, or Feast of Eggs (Festum Ovarum), the day before Quinquagesima Sunday.

By the common people too, the preceding Saturday (that preceding "the Sunday before the first in Lent"), in Oxfordshire particularly, is called Egg Saturday.
Hampson, Medil. & Cal.alendarium, I. 138.

Electric egg, a form of electrical apparatus used to illustrate the influence of the pressure of the air upon the electrical discharge. It consists of an ellipsoidal glass vessel with brass rods inserted at the ends. When it is exhausted of air, and a discharge of high-potential electricity is passed between these poles, a continuous violet tuft of light connects them, the form of which varies with the degree of exhaustion. — Epiphial egg. See epiphial.
Mohr's egg, the bezon-stone of the mohr, an antelope. — Boe's egg. See Boe. — To come in with five eggs, to make a foolish remark or suggestion.

Whiles another youth counsel to make peace with the Kyng of Arragone, . . . another counsellor in wylth hys
e. eggs, and aduysyth to howke in the Kyng of Castell.
Sir T. More, Utopia, tr. by Robinson (ed. 1551) sig. E. vi.

To put all one's eggs into one basket, to venture all one has in one speculation or investment. To take eggs for money, to allow one's self to be imposed upon by a saying which originated at a time when eggs were so plentiful as scarcely to have a money value.

Leon Mine honest friend,
Will you take eggs for money?
Mum. No, my lord, I'll fight.
Shak., W. T., I. 2.

O rogue, rogue, I shall have eggs for my money, I must hang myself.
Boileau, Moliere at Midnight.

egg¹ (eg), v. t. [egg¹, n.] 1. To apply eggs to; cover or mix with eggs, as cutlets, fish, bread, etc., in cooking. — 2. To pelt with eggs. [U. S.]

The abolition editor of the "Newport (Ky.) News" was egged out of Alexandria, Campbell County, in that State, on Monday.
Baltimore Sun, Aug. 1, 1857.

egg² (eg), v. t. [ME. eggen, incite, urge on, instigate (in either good or bad sense), < leel. egga = Sw. egga, upp-egga = Dan. egge, op-egge, incite, egge, lit. 'edge'; < leel. egg = Sw. egg = Dan. egg = AS. egg, E. edge; see edge, n., and edge, v., a doublet of egg².] To incite or urge; encourage; instigate; provoke; now nearly always with on.

Adam and Eve he egged to don ill,
Conside Cayne to cullen his brother.
Hiers Phoenician (C), II. 61.

Some upon no lust & lawfull grounds (being egged on by ambition, ennie, and couetise) are induced to follow the armie.
Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 155.

Thou shouldst be prancing of thy steed,
To egg thy soldiers forward in thy wars.
Greene, Alphonsus, III.

egg-albumin (eg'al-bū'min), n. The albumin which occurs in the white of eggs. It is closely allied to serum-albumin, but differs in certain physical properties.

egg-animal (eg'an-i-mal), n. One of the Ovaria.

egg-apple (eg'ap'l), n. Same as egg-plant.

egger, n. See egger³.

egg-bag (eg'bag), n. 1. The ovary. — 2. A bag used by conjurers, from which eggs seem to be taken though it is empty.

egg-bald (eg'bald), a. Bald as an egg; completely bald. Tennyson.

egg-basket (eg'bās'ket), n. An open wire basket for use in boiling eggs, by means of which the eggs may all be taken up at once, and the water drained off of them.

egg-beater (eg'hā'ter), n. An instrument having a piece to be twirled by the hand, for use in whipping eggs.

egg-bird (eg'berd), n. 1. A popular name of the sooty tern, Sterna (Haliastur) fuliginosa, whose eggs, like those of some other terns, have commercial value in the West Indies and southern United States. — 2. A name of sundry other sea-birds, as murres, gullenots, etc., which nest in large communities, and whose eggs are of economic or commercial value.

egg-blower (eg'blo'er), n. A blowpipe used by oölogists in emptying eggs of their contents by forcing in a stream of air or water with the breath through a hole in the shell made with the egg-drill. They are of various styles and sizes, generally curved or hooked at the small end like a chemist's blowpipe, but smaller and flatter at the point.

egg-born (eg'börn), a. Produced from an egg, as all animals are; but specifically, hatched from the egg of an oviparous animal.

egg-carrier (eg'kur'i-er), n. A device for transporting eggs without injury. (a) A box or frame with pockets or partitions of cloth, wire, cardboard, etc., for holding each a single egg of poultry. (b) In fish culture, an apparatus for carrying ova in water to be subsequently hatched.

egg-case (eg'kas), n. A natural casing or envelop of some kinds of eggs. (a) The cocoon or case in which the eggs of various insects, as the cockroach, are contained when laid. (b) The silken case in which many spiders inclose their eggs, an egg pouch. (c) The case in which the eggs of sharks and other elasmobranchs are contained; a sea-barrow. (d) The ovipositor of various marine carnivorous gastropods, especially of the families Buccinidae, Muriceidae, etc. See ovipositor.

egg-cell (eg'sel), n. An ovum; an ovule; an egg itself, when it is in the cell stage, or state of a cell, as a nucleated mass of protoplasm, with or without a nucleolus, and with or without a cell-wall, but ordinarily possessing both. See ovum.

egg-cleavage (eg'klō'vaj), n. The segmentation of the vitellus of an egg; cell-cleavage of an egg-cell; the germination of an ovum, ovule, or egg from the stage of a cytula to that of a morula. It is one of the earliest processes of germination, in which the single mass of the formative yolk is divided into a great number of other masses or cells, by subsequent differentiation of which the whole body of the embryo is formed. Egg-cleavage proceeds in various "rhythms" or ratios, as 2, 4, 8, 16, etc. See discoidal egg-cleavage. See discoidal.

egg-cockle (eg'kok'l), n. An edible cockle, Cardium edatum.

egg-cup (eg'kup), n. A cup for use in eating soft-boiled eggs. In its original form it is made to hold a single egg upright while this is eaten out of the shell with a spoon. Another form is double, with one end like the former, and the reverse end larger for eggs to be broken into it.

egg-dance (eg'dāns), n. A dance by a single performer, who is required to execute a complicated figure, blindfolded, among a number of eggs, without touching them.

Preparations in the middle of the road for the egg dance, so strikingly described by Goethe.
Horne, Year Book, p. 607.

egg-drill (eg'dril), n. An instrument for drilling or boring a small round hole in the shell of a bird's egg, used by oölogists. It consists of a bit of steel or iron bar which may be twirled in the fingers, having a sharp pointed conical head rounded to a tapering surface.

egger, n. and v. An obsolete form of edge.

eggement, n. See eggment.

egg-ended (eg'en'ded), a. Terminated by ovaloid caps or ends.

Spherical shells, such as the caps of conical and cylindrical cal boilers.
Book of Steam Engine, 403.

egger¹ (eg'er), n. [egg¹ + -er]. Also called eggler, where the l appears to be merely intrusive. One who makes a business of collecting eggs, as of birds or turtles.

egger² (eg'et), n. [egg², v. + -er]. One who eggs, urges, or incites; usually with on.

egger³ (eg'er), n. [Also written eggar; origin uncertain.] In anatomy, a reddish-brown moth of either of the genera Lacompia and Eragrostis; as, the oak-egger, L. quercus; the grass-egger, L. trifolii; the small egger, E. lacustris.

egger-moth (eg'er-mōth), n. Same as egger³.

eggery (eg'er-ē), n.; pl. eggeries (-iz). [egg¹ + -ery]. A nest of eggs; a place where eggs are laid. [Rare.]

egg-fish (eg'fish), n. One of many names applied to gymnodont plectognath fishes, from their shape when inflated. They are chiefly of the family Tetrodontidae.

egg-flip (eg'fip'), n. A hot drink made of ale or beer with eggs, sugar, spice, and sometimes a little spirit, thoroughly beaten together. It is popularly called a yard of flannel, from its fleecy appearance.

The revolution itself was born in the room of the Caucus Club, amidst clouds of smoke and deep positions of egg-flip.
Amateenth Century, XXXIII. 30.

egg-forceps (eg'fōr'seps), n. sing. and pl. 1. An instrument used in fish-culture in handling or removing ova. Also called egg-tongs. — 2. A delicate spring-forceps used by oölogists to pick out pieces of the embryo or membrane from eggs prepared for the cabinet.

egg-glass (eg'glas), n. 1. A sand-glass running about three minutes, for timing the boiling of eggs. — 2. An egg-cup of glass.

egg-glue (eg'glō), n. A tough, viscid, gelatinous substance in which the eggs of some animals, as crustaceans, are enveloped, serving to attach them to the body of the parent; oöglon.

egg-hot (eg'hot), n. A posset made of eggs, ale, sugar, and brandy. Lamb.

egging (eg'ing), n. The act of art of collecting eggs, as for oölogical or commercial purposes; the business of an egger.

egg-laying (eg'lay'ing), a. Oviparous; laying eggs to be hatched outside the body.

eggler (eg'lēr), n. See egger¹.

egg-lighter (eg'li'tēr), n. Same as egg-tester.

egg-membrane (eg'mem'bran), n. The cell-wall of an ovum; the vitelline membrane; in ornith., the egg-pod.

eggment (eg'ment), n. [ME. eggement; < egg² + -ment]. Incitement; instigation.

Thorough womanhood eggment.
Mankind was born, and damned ay to die.
Chaucer, Man of Law's Tale, l. 744.

egg-nog (eg'nog'), n. A sweet, rich, and stimulating cold drink made of eggs, milk, sugar, and spirits. The yolks of the eggs are thoroughly mixed with the sugar (a tablespoonful for each egg), and half a pint of spirits is added for each dozen of eggs. Lastly, half a pint of milk for each egg is stirred in. The whites of the eggs are used to make a froth.

egg-pie (eg'pi'), n. A pie made of eggs. Ball-weil.

egg-plant (eg'plant), n. The brinjal or aubergine, Solanum Melongena, cultivated for its large oblong or ovate fruit, which is of a dark-purple color, or sometimes white or yellow. The fruit is highly esteemed as a vegetable. Also called egg-apple, maul-apple.

Flowering Branch and Fruit of Egg-plant (Solanum Melongena).

egg-pod (eg'pod), n. A pod or case enveloping and containing an egg or eggs; specifically, in ornith., the membrana putaminis, the tough membrane which lines the shell of a bird's egg. See putamen.

egg-pop (eg'pop'), n. A kind of egg-nog. [New Eng.]

Le wis temporarily contended with the stronger fascination of egg-pop.
Lowell, Virside Travels, p. 60.

No more egg-pop, made with eggs that would have been fighting cock, to judge by the pugilist the beverage containing their yolks developed. O. W. Holmes, Essays, p. 166.

egg-pouch (eg'pouch), n. A sac of silk or other material in which certain spiders and insects carry their eggs; the cocoon.

eggs-and-bacon (egz'and-bā'kn), n. [So called from the two shades of yellow in the flowers.]

1. The bird's-foot trefoil, Lotus corniculatus. — 2. The fowl flax, Linum catharticum.

eggs-and-collops (egz'and kol'ops), n. Same as eggs-and-bacon.

egg-sauce (eg'sāw), n. Sauce prepared with eggs, used with boiled fish, fowls, etc.

egg-shaped (eg'shap), a. Ovoid; having the figure of a solid whose cross-section anywhere is circular, and whose long section is oval (deeper near one end than near the other). An egg-shaped egg is technically distinguished in oölogy from an elliptical, pariform, or subpariform egg.

egg-shell (eg'shel), n. The shell or outside covering of an egg; chiefly said of the hard, brittle, calcareous covering of birds' eggs. This shell consists mostly of carbonate of lime or chalk, deposlled upon and in among the fibers of the egg pod or putamen. It is a secretion of a particular calcareous tract of the oviduct near the end of that tube. It may be nearly colorless and of such crystalline purity and transparency that the contents of the fresh egg show a pinkish bluish through it, or very heavy, opaque, flaky white; whole colored of various tones, as green, blue, drab, ochrey, etc.; or partly-colored in many shades of reds, browns, etc., in endless variety of patterns. Besides the evident diversity of character in thickness, roughness, etc., the shell has many variations in microscopic texture, depending upon details of the deposition of the particles of lime in the pod. The shell of an ostrich's egg is so thick and hard that it may seriously wound a man if the egg explodes, as it sometimes does when added, in consequence of the compression of the gases generated in decomposition. Egg-shell china.

egg-shell porcelain. porcelain of extreme thinness and transparency. It was made originally in China, and is now produced also in European factories, where the process consists in filling a mold of plaster of Paris with the material called barbotine, of which a thin film at once adheres to the mold from the absorption of its moisture by the gypsum. The liquid barbotine being then thrown out and the mold put into the kiln, the film remaining in it is baked, and can then be removed from the mold.

egg-slice (eg'slīs), n. A kitchen utensil for removing omelets or fried eggs from a pan.

egg-spoon (eg'spōn), n. A small spoon for eating eggs from the shell.

egg-syringe (eg'sir'inj), n. A small, light metal syringe for forcing a stream of water into an egg to empty it, or to wash the inside of the shell, for oölogical purposes. The best are made with a ring in the end of the piston large enough to insert the thumb, so that they can be worked with one hand while the other holds the egg. The nozzle is fine, and may be variously curved.

egg-tester (eg'tes'ter), n. A device for examining eggs by transmitted light to test their age and condition or the advancement of an embryonic chick. It may be in the form of a dark lantern with an opening through which the egg is viewed, or of a box with perforated lid carrying the eggs, and a reflector below for throwing the light through them, or in the much simpler and more practical form of a conical tube, the egg being held toward the light against the orifice at the larger end and observed by means of an eye hole in the smaller end. Also egg lighter.

egg-timer (eg'ti'mér), n. A sand-glass used for determining the time in boiling eggs.

egg-tongs (eg'tongz), n. sing. and pl. Same as egg-forceps, q. v.

egg-tooth (eg'tōth), n. A hard point or process on the beak or snout of the embryo of an oviparous animal, as a bird or reptile, by means of which the rupture or breakage of the egg-shell may be facilitated.

The embryo of serpents is provided with an egg-tooth, a special development like that of the chick. Stand. Nat. Hist., III, 3-2.

egg-trot (eg'trōt), n. In the manège, a cautious jog-trot pace, like that of a housewife riding to market with eggs in her panniers. Also called eggwife-trot.

egg-tube (eg'tūb), n. In zoöl., a tubular organ in which ova are developed, or through which they are conveyed to or toward the exterior of the body; an oviduct.

The ovaries (in Lepidoptera) consist on either side of four very long many chambered egg tubes, which contain a great quantity of eggs. Chas. Zoology (trans.), p. 381.

egg-urchin (eg'er'ehin), n. A globular sea urchin; one of the echini proper, or regular sea-urchins, as distinguished from the flat ones known as cake-urchins, or the cordate ones called heart-urchins.

eggwife (eg'wif), n. A woman who sells eggs. Eggwife-trot. Same as egg-trot.

eghet, n. An obsolete variant of eye. Chaucer.

egidos, n. pl. [Sp.] See egida.

egilopic, egilopical, etc. See agilopic, etc.

egis, n. See egys.

eglandular (ē-glan'dū-lār), a. [L. e- priv. + glandula, gland: see glandular.] In botl., having no glands.

eglandulose, eglandulous (ē-glan'dū-lōs, -lūs), a. [L. e- priv. + glandula, gland: see glandulose.] Same as eglandular.

eglantine (ē-glan'tin or -tin), n. [Early mod. E. also eplentine: first in the 16th century, < F. eplantine, eplantine*, non eplantine (= Pr. eplantine), eglantine (cf. OF. eplantine, adj., pertaining to the eglantine); with suffix -ine (E. -ine, L. -inus, fem. -ina), < OF. eplant, eplant, eplant = Pr. eplant, sweetbrier, hip-tree, *< L. eplentus, an assumed form, lit. prickly, thorny, < aculeus, a sting, prickle, thorn, < acus, a point, needle: see aculeus, and cf. aglet.] 1. The sweetbrier, Rosa rubiginosa. It flowers in June and July and grows in dry, bushy places.

When the lily leaf, and the eglantine,
Both bud and spring with a merry cheer.

The Noble Fisherman (Child's Ballads, V, 82).

Sweet is the eglantine, but prickly new.
Swinney, Sonnets xxvi.

The leaf of eglantine, whom not to slander,
Outwester'd not thy breath.

Shak., Cymbeline, iv, 2.

2. The wild rose or dogrose, Rosa canina.

Eglantine, cynorrodon. Levin, Manip. Vocab. (1670).

To hear the lark begin his flight,
And at my window bid good morrow
Through the sweet-brier or the vine
Or the twisted eglantine.

Milton, L. Allegro, l. 48.

Eglantine has sometimes been erroneously taken for the honey-suckle, and it seems more than probable that Milton so understood it, by his calling it "twisted." If not, he must have meant the widdow.

Nares.

eglateret, n. [ME., also eglantier (the form eglateret in Tennyson being a spurious mod. archaism); = MD., eghlentier, < OF. eglentier, eglater, aglantier, aglantier, eglantier (cf. Pr. eplantier), the eglantine, prop. the bush or tree as distinguished from the flower; with suffix -ler (E. -ler, L. -arius), < aglant, aglant, aglant, the eglantine: see eglantine.] The sweetbrier; eglantine.

He was led into a garden of Cayphas, and there he was crowned with eglentier.

Manderly, Travels, p. 14.

The woodbine and eglentier.

Drip sweeter dew than traitor's tear

Tennyson, A Dirge.

eglentinet, n. An obsolete spelling of eglantine. Minshew.

eglomeratet (ē-glōm'er-ēt), v. t.: pret. and pp. egglomerated, ppr. egglomerating. [< L. e-, out, + glomeratus, pp. of glomerare, wind up into a ball: see glomerate.] To unwind, as a thread from a ball. Coles, 1717.

egma (eg'mā), n. A humorous corruption of enigma.

Some enigmas, some riddle come, thy envoy;
begin

Cost. No egma, no riddle, no envoy; ego (ē'gō), n. [< L. ego = Gk. ἐγώ = AS. ic, E. I: see I.] The "I"; that which feels, acts, and thinks; any person's "self," considered as essentially the same in all persons. This use of the word was introduced by Descartes, and has long been current in general literature.

The ego, as the subject of thought and knowledge, is now commonly styled by philosophers simply the subject, and subjective is a familiar expression for what pertains to the mind or thinking power. In contrast and correlation to these, the terms object and objective are now in use to denote the non-ego, its affections and properties, and, in general, the really existent as opposed to the ideally known. See W. Hamilton.

For the ego without the non-ego is impossible in fact and meaningless in thought, and the abstraction of the ego from the bodily organization and the intuition of itself by itself as a non-bodily entity is an artificial and deceptive process. Maudsley, Body and Will, p. 13.

Absolute ego. See absolute. The empirical ego, the self as the object of itself, what "I am conscious of as 'myself'." The pure ego, the self regarded abstractly as the mere thinking subject, apart from every object of thought, even itself.

ego-altruistic (ē'gō-al-trō-ist'ik), a. Relating or pertaining to one's self and to others. See the extract.

From the egotistic sentiments we pass now to the ego-altruistic sentiments. By this name I mean sentiments which, while implying self-gratification, also imply gratification in others; the representation of this gratification in others being a source of pleasure not intrinsically, but because of ulterior benefits to self which experience associates with it. H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 411.

egohood (ē'gō-hūd), n. [< ego + -hood.] Individuality; personality. Brit. Quarterly Rev.

egoical (ē'gō-ik-āl), a. [< ego + -ic-āl.] Pertaining to egotism. Rare. [Rare.]

egotism (ē'gō-iz-m), n. [= D. G. egotismus = Dan. egotisme = Sw. egotism = F. egotisme = Sp. Pg. It. egotismo: see ego + -ism.] 1. The habit of valuing everything only in reference to one's personal interest; pure selfishness or exclusive reference to self as an element of character.

The Ideal, the True and Noble that was in them having faded out, and nothing now remaining but naked egotism, vulturous greediness, they cannot live. Cordyle.

2. In ethics, the doing or seeking of that which affords pleasure or advantage to one's self, in distinction to that which affords pleasure or advantage to others; opposed to altruism. In this sense the term does not necessarily imply anything reprehensible, and is not synonymous with egotism.

Egotism is the feeling which demands for self an increase of enjoyment and diminution of discomfort. Altruism is that which demands the reverse for others.

L. E. Ward, Dynam. Sociol., I, 34.

Egotism comprises the sum of inclinations that aim at purely personal gratification, each of these inclinations having its particular gratification; and the further we go back in civilization, the greater is the predominance which these egotistic impulses have.

Maudsley, Body and Will, p. 164.

3. In metaph., the opinion that no matter exists and only one mind, that of the individual holding the opinion. The term is also applied (by critics) to forms of subjective idealism supposed logically to result in such an opinion. See solipsism, § 1. Pride, Egotism, etc. See egotism.

egoist (ē'gō-ist), n. [= D. G. Dan. Sw. egoist = F. egoiste = Sp. Pg. It. egoista: see ego + -ist.] 1. One who is characterized by egotism; a selfish or self-centered person. 2. In metaph., one holding the doctrine of egotism.

egotistic, egotistical (ē'gō-ist'ik, -ti-kāl), a. [< egoist + -ic, -ical.] 1. Characterized by the vice of egotism; absorbed in self. 2. In ethics, pertaining or relating to one's self, and not to others; relating to the promotion of one's own well-being, or the gratification of one's own desires; characterized by egotism: opposed to altruistic.

The adequately egotistic individual retains those powers which make altruistic activities possible.

H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 72.

3. In metaph., involving the doctrine that nothing exists but the ego.

The egotistical idealism of Fichte is less exposed to criticism than the theological idealism of Berkeley.

Sir W. Hamilton.

Egotistical object, a mode of consciousness regarded as an object. Egotistical representationism, the doctrine that the external world is known to us by means of representative ideas, and that these are modifications of consciousness.

egotistically (ē'gō-ist'ik-āl-i), adv. In an egotistic manner; as regards one's self.

Each profits egotistically from the growth of an altruism which leads each to aid in preventing or diminishing others' violence.

H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 77.

egoity (ē'gō-ī-ti), n. [< ego + -ity.] The essential element of the ego or self; egohood.

This innocent imposture, which I have all along taken care to carry on, as it then was of some use, has since been of regular service to me, and, by being mentioned in one of my papers, effectually recovered my egoity out of the hands of some gentlemen who endeavoured to correct it for me.

Swift, On Harrison a Tailor, No. 28.

If you would permit me to use a school term, I would say the egoity remains: that is, that by which I am the same I was.

H. Wollaston, Religion of Nature, ix, § 8.

The non-ego out of which we arise must somehow have an egoity in it as cause of finite ego.

Amer. Jour. Psychol., I, 646.

egoize (ē'gō-iz), v. t.: pret. and pp. egoized, ppr. egoizing. [< ego + -ize.] To give excessive attention or consideration to one's self, or to what relates to one's self; be absorbed in self. [Rare.]

egophonic, egophony. See agophonic, agophony.

egotheism (ē'gō-the-izm), n. [< Gk. ἐγώ, = E. I, + theos, God, + -ism.] The deification of self; the substitution of self for the Deity; also, the opinion that the individual self is essentially divine.

egotism (ē'gō-tizm or eg'o-tizm), n. [< ego + t (see egotist) + -ism.] 1. The practice of putting forward or dwelling upon one's self; the habit of talking or writing too much about one's self.

Adieu to egotism; I am sick to death at the very name of self.

Shelley, in Bowden, I, 101.

It is idle to criticize the egotism of autobiographies, however pervading and intense.

W. R. Greg, Misc. Essays, 1st ser., p. 177.

Hence—2. An excessive esteem or consideration for one's self, leading one to judge of everything by its relation to one's own interests or importance.

The most violent egotism which I have met with . . . is that of Cardinal Wolsey, "Ego et rex meus, I and my King."

Spectator, No. 562.

There can be no doubt that this remarkable man owed the vast influence which he exercised over his contemporaries at least as much to his gloomy egotism as to the real power of his poetry.

Macaulay, Moore's Byron.

Selfishness is only active egotism.

Louell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 264.

2. Syn. Pride, Egotism, Vanity, Conceit, Self-conceit, Self-consciousness. Pride and egotism imply a certain indifference to the opinions of others concerning one's self. Pride is a self-contained satisfaction with the excellence of what one is or has, despising what others say or think. Vanity is just the opposite; it is the love of being even fulsomely admired. Pride rests often upon higher or intrinsic things, as pride of family, place, or power; intellectual or spiritual pride. Vanity rests often upon lower and external things, as beauty, figure, dress, ornaments; but the essential difference is in the question of dependence upon others. Over the same things one person might have pride and another vanity. One may be too proud to be vain. Conceit, or self-conceit, is an overestimate of one's own abilities or accomplishments; it is too much an elevation of the real self to rest upon wealth, dress, or other external things. Egotism is a strong and obtrusive confidence in one's self, shown primarily in conversation, not only by frequent references to self, but by monopolizing attention, ignoring the opinions of others, etc. It differs from egotism chiefly in its selfishness and unconsciousness of its appearance in the eyes of others. Conceit becomes egotism when it is selfish enough to disparage others for its own comparative elevation. Self-consciousness is often confounded with egotism, conceit, or snobism, but it may be only an embarrassing sense of one's own personality, an inability to refrain from thinking how one appears to others; it therefore often makes one shrink out of notice.

Vanity makes men ridiculous, pride odious. Steele.
Pride, indeed, pervaded the whole man, was written in the harsh, rigid lines of his face, was marked by the way in which he stood, and, above all, in which he bowed. Macaulay, William Pitt.
His excessive egotism, which filled all objects with himself. Hamilt.

We never could very clearly understand how it is that egotism, so unpopular in conversation, should be so popular in writing. Macaulay, Moore's Byron.

These sparks with awkward vanity display
What the fine gentleman wore yesterday. Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 329.

Conceit may puff a man up, but never prop him up. Ruskin, True and Beautiful.

They that have the least reason have the most self-conceit. Whichecke.

Something which befalls you may seem a great misfortune;—you . . . begin to think that it is a chastisement, or a warning. . . . But give up this egotistic indulgence of your fancy; examine a little what misfortunes, greater a thousand fold, are happening, every second, to twenty times worthier persons; and your self-consciousness will change into pity and humility. Ruskin, Ethics of the Dust, v.

egotist (ē-gō-tist or ē-gō-tist), n. [< ego + t (inserted to avoid hiatus, or after the analogy of dramatist, epigrammatist, etc.) + -ist. Cf. egotist, egotism, etc.] One who is characterized by egotism, in either sense of that word.

We are all egotists in sickness and debility. O. W. Holmes, Old Fol. of Life, p. 25.

egotistic, egotistical (ē-gō- or ē-gō-tis'tik, ē-gō- or ē-gō-tis'ti-kul), a. Pertaining to or of the nature of egotism; characterized by egotism; as, an egotistic remark; an egotistic person.

It would, indeed, be scarcely safe to draw any decided inferences as to the character of a writer from passages directly egotistical. Macaulay.

= Syn. Conceited, vain, self-important, opinionated as suming. See egotism.

egotistically (ē-gō- or ē-gō-tis'ti-kul-i), adv. In an egotistical manner.

egotize (ē-gō-tiz or ē-gō-tiz), v. i.; pret. and pp. egotized, ppr. egotizing. [< ego + t (see egotist) + -ize.] To talk or write much of one's self; exhibit egotism. [Rare.]

I egotize in my letters to thee, not because I am of much importance to myself, but because to thee both ego and all that ego does are interesting. Cooper, To Lady Hesketh.

In these humble essays I have taken leave to egotize. Thackeray, A Hundred Years Hence.

egranulose (ē-gran'u-lōs), a. [< L. e-priv. + granulose.] In bot., not granulose; without granulations.

egret (ē-grē), n. Same as caper 2.

egreet, prep. phr. as adv. A Middle English form of agree.

Thence the emperor was egreet, and enkerly fraynes
The answer of Arthur. Morte Arthure (E. E. T. 3), l. 107.

egre-fint, n. See eggle-fint.

egregious (ē-grē-jus), a. [< L. egregius, distinguished, surpassing, eminent, excellent, < e-, ex, out, + grex (greg-), flock; see gregarious.] Above the common; beyond what is usual; extraordinary. (a) In a good sense, distinguished; remarkable.

Erictus
'Hove thunder sits: to thee, egregious soul,
Let all flesh bend. Marston, Sophonisba, iv. 1.

He might be able to adorn this present age, and furnish history with the records of egregious exploits both of art and valour. Dr. H. More, Antitude against Atheism.

This essay [Pope's "Essay on Man"] affords an egregious instance of the predominance of genius, the dazzling splendour of imagery, and the seductive powers of eloquence. Johnson, Pope.

(b) Now, more commonly in a bad or condemnatory sense, extreme; enormous.

These last times, . . . for insolency, pride, and egregious contempt of all good order, are the worst. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, Pref., iv.

Ah me, most credulous fool,
Egregious murderer, thist, anything
That's due to all the villains past, in being,
To come? Shak., Cymbeline, v. 1.

People that want sense do always in an egregious manner want modesty. Steele, Tatler, No. 47.

You have made, too, some egregious mistakes about English law, pointed out to me by one of the first lawyers in the King's Bench. Sydney Smith, To Francis Jeffrey.

= Syn. (b) Huge, monstrous, astonishing, surprising, unique, exceptional, uncommon, unprecedented.

egregiously (ē-grē-jus-li), adv. In an egregious manner.

Make the Moor thank me, love me, and reward me,
For making him egregiously an ass. Shak., Othello, II. 1.

What can be more egregiously absurd, than to dissent in our opinion, and dissent in our choice, from infinite wisdom? Barrow, Works, l. xviii.

egregiousness (ē-grē-jus-nēs), n. The state or quality of being egregious.

egremolinet, n. An obsolete variant of agrimony. Chaucer.

egress (ē-gres, formerly ē-gres'), n. [= Pg. lt. egresso, < L. egressus, a going out, < egressus, pp. of egredi, go out, < e-, out, + grad, go; see grade. Cf. ingress, progress, regress.] 1. The act of going or issuing out; a going or passing out; departure, especially from an inclosed or confined place.

Their [bishops'] lips, as doors, are not to be opened but for egress of instruction and sound knowledge. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, vi. 94.

Gates of burning adamant, Bar'd over us, prohibit all egress. Milton, P. L., II. 437.

2. Provision for passing out; a means or place of exit.

The egress, on this side, is under a great stone archway, thrown out from the palace and surmounted with the family arms. H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 102.

3. In astron., the passing of a star, planet, or satellite (except the moon) out from behind or before the disk of the sun, the moon, or a planet.

egress (ē-gres'), v. i. [< L. egressus, pp. of egredi, go out; see egress, n. Cf. agress, progress.] To go out; depart; leave. [Rare.]

egression (ē-gresh'on), n. [= Sp. (obs.) egresion, < L. egressus, a going out, < egressus, pp. of egredi, go out; see egress.] The act of going out, especially from an inclosed or confined place; departure; outward passage; egress. [Rare.]

Do, so that mayst have a triumphal egression. Pope, In a cart, to be lauged.

J. Johnson, Devil in an Ass, v. 4.

The who and good men of the world, especially in the days and periods of their joy and festival egresses, chose to throw some ashes into their cheeks. Jen. Tait, Holy Dying, II. 1.

egressor (ē-gres'or), n. One who goes out.

egret (ē-grēt), n. [Also, in some senses, agret, agrette, formerly egret, egrette, agret, < F. agrette, a sort of heron, a tuft of feathers, a tuft, a cluster (of diamonds, etc.), the down of seeds, etc., dim. of *OF. aigre, aigron*, mod. F. dial. aigron, found in OF. only with loss of the guttural, heron, mod. F. heron, a heron, whence F. heron, see heron.] 1. A name common to those species of herons which have long, loose-webbed plumes, forming tufts on the head and neck, or a flowing train from the back.

In the famous feast of Archbishop Norvill we find no less than a thousand astirides, egrets or cattas, as it is differently spelt. Pennant, Brit. Zoology.

2. A heron's plume.

Their head tyres of flowers mix'd with silver, and gold,
With some sprigs of egrets among. H. Johnson, Masques, Chloridia.

3. A topknot, plume, or bunch of long feathers upon the head of a bird; a plumecorn; as, the egrets of an owl.—4. Same as agret, 2.—5. In bot., the flying, feathery, or hairy down of seeds, as the down of the thistle.—6. A monkey, Macacus cynomolgus, an East Indian species commonly seen in confinement. Great white egret, the white heron of Europe (Herodias alba), or of America

(Herodias egretta), 3 feet or more in length, entirely white, with a magnificent train of long, decomposed, fastigate plumes drooping far beyond the tail.—Little white egret, the small white heron of Europe (Garzetta leucola), or of America (Garzetta candidissima), about 2 feet long, with an egret on the head, and a recurved dorsal train. —Reddish egret, dichrois egret, herons of the genera Hydranassa, Dichromanassa, Demicapra, etc., with variegated (sometimes white) plumage, and long dorsal train.

egretti, egrettes, n. See egret.

egrimony, n. An obsolete form of agrimony.

Agrimony bread is very pleasant. R. Sharrock, 1608.

egrimony 2 (ē-grī-mo-ni), n. [< L. agrimonia, sorrow, anxiety, < ager, sick, troubled, sorrowful.] Sickness of the mind; sadness; sorrow. Chaucer.

egriot (ē-grī-ot), n. [Formerly also agriote, < OF. agriote, "agriote, the ordinary sharp or tart cherry, which we also call Agriote-cherry" (Cotgrave), mod. F. griotte, prob. ult. *< Gr. ἀγριότης (?) for ἀγριός, wild, ἀγριός, wild, < ἀγρός, field; see Agrostis, etc.] A kind of sour cherry.

egritude (ē-grī- or ē-grī-tūd), n. [= It. egitudine, < L. egritudo, < ager, sick, troubled, sorrowful.] Mental trouble; sorrow; distress; more rarely, bodily sickness.

I do not intend to write to the cure of egritudes or sicknesses confined. Sir T. Elyot, Castle of Health, iv.

Now, now we symbolize in egritude,
And sympathize in Cupid's malady. Cyprian Academy (1647), p. 34.

equalmente (ā-gwāl-men'te), adv. [It., equally, evenly, < equale, < L. equalis, equal.] In music, evenly; a direction in playing.

equial (ē-gwāl-zā'), a. In her., same as equial.

Egyptian (ē-jip'shan), a. and n. [Early mod. E. also Egyptian, Egyptien, Egyptien (also by aphorism Egyptian, Gipsen, etc., whence mod. Gipsy, q. v.); < OF. Egyptian, F. Egyptian = Sp. Egipcio, < L. Egyptius, < Gr. Αἰγύπτιος, Egyptian, < Αἴγυπτος (L. Egyptus), m., Egypt, fem., the Nile. The name does not appear to be of Egyptian or Semitic origin.] 1. a. 1. Pertaining to Egypt, a country in the north-eastern part of Africa, in the valley and delta of the Nile.—2. Gipsy. See II. 2. Egyptian architecture, the architecture of ancient Egypt, which, among its peculiar monuments, exhibits pyramids, rock-cut temples and tombs, and gigantic monolithic obelisks. The characteristic features of the style are solidity and the majestic attending colossal size. Among its peculiarities are: (a) The gradual converging or sloping inward of most of its exterior wall-surfaces. This is especially noticeable in the pylons or monumental gateways standing singly or in series before its temples. (b) Roofs and covered ways, flat, and composed of immense blocks of stone, reaching from one wall or stone edifice beam to another, the arch, although in all its forms of frequent use in drains and similar works, not being employed in architecture above ground, which holds consistently to the system of intel. construction. (c) Columns, numerous, close, and massive, without bases, or with broad, flat, low bases, and exhibiting great variety in their capitals, from a simple square block to a wide spreading bell, elaborately carved with palm leaves or other forms suggested by vegetation, especially in some adaptation of the lotus plant, bird, or flower. (d) The employment of a large concave moulding to crown the entablature, decorated with vertical flutings or leaves. (e) Walls and columns decorated with a profusion of sculptures in incised outline, often of admirable precision (see cara rigata), or in low relief, representing divinities, men, and animals, with innumerable hieroglyphs, brilliant and true, though simple, coloring being superadded. A remarkable feature of Egyptian architecture is the redundancy of its mechanical operations, as in cutting, polishing, sculpturing, and transporting enormous blocks of limestone and of granite, and in its stupendous excavations in the solid rock. The prototype of the Greek Doric order is to be sought in such Egyptian column structure as the groto-facades of Beni Hassan, and from the Egyptian lotus carvings and decoration were developed many characteristic Assyrian derivative motives, as well as the Ionic capital and the graceful antediluvian moulding of Greece. See masarab, obelisk, pylon, pyramid, pyrina, etc. Egyptian art, the architecture, sculpture, and painting of ancient Egypt, one of the most important of the great artistic developments of the world. (See Egyptian architecture, above.) The earliest known

Egyptian sculptures, not less than 6,000 years old, exhibit great technical skill, approach nature with remarkable ease and certainty, and far surpass in naturalness the more conventional works which succeeded them. Yet the best Egyptian works of all times possess striking individuality as well as refinement, a very large proportion of the vast number of portrait statues and reliefs being evidently likenesses, and the physical differences of class, station, and employment, as well as ethnological differences in the countless historical scenes, being clearly rendered. With the advent of the Ptolemies, Greek influences were brought to bear upon Egyptian art, which progressively lost its good qualities without acquiring those of the art of Greece and of Rome. The great Sphinx of Ghizeh is the oldest as well as the largest work of sculpture known; the colossal Amenhotep (Amenhotep) III. at Thebes (one of them is the famous Memnon, so called) are about 52 feet high; those of the Kamoseum are of the same height, and that of Tanis is nearly 60 feet high. Egyptian painting is strictly illumination, as the colors are laid on flat, without shading or gradation, within a definite outline. The drawing is typically of great beauty, the outlines being firm, accurate, and graceful. In gem-cutting and jewelry, in enamel, in terra cotta and glass, in the carving of wood and ivory, in metal working, and in the industrial arts generally, Egyptian artists and artisans displayed great taste and skill, and were enabled by the diffusion of material prosperity to devise and perfect their products in endless diversity. — Egyptian bean. See bean. — Egyptian black ware, a name given by Wedgwood to one of his varieties of fine earthenware; same as basalt ware (which see under basalt). — Egyptian blue. See blue. — Egyptian chlorosis. See chlorosis. — Egyptian cloth. Same as mummy-cloth. — Egyptian darkness, deep or total darkness: in allusion to the ninth plague of Egypt (Ex. x. 21-23). — Egyptian frog, a toad (Bufo). — Egyptian gold. See gold. — Egyptian goose. See goose. — Egyptian herring. See herring. — Egyptian lotus. See lotus. — Egyptian pebble, a species of agate or jasper. — Egyptian pebbleware. See pebbleware. — Egyptian porcelain, the name given to a ceramic ware of a blue or greenish color, made in the form of small mummy-shaped figures, and, more rarely, of figures of divinities, and cups, goblets, and the like, found in ancient Egyptian tombs. The material seems to have been and held together by a relatively small amount of potter's clay; this, when fired, turns to an opaque glass or enamel throughout its whole mass. The color is an oxid of copper, which is applied to the surface, and stains the ware very deeply. — Egyptian vulture. See vulture. — Egyptian ware, a variety of Wedgwood ware.

II. n. 1. A native of Egypt; a member of any of the different races constituting the permanent population of Egypt; more specifically, a member or a descendant of the ancient Egyptian race or races, supposed to be now represented chiefly by the Copts and the fellahs or peasantry, as distinguished from the Arabs and other later settlers. — 2. A gipsy.

eider (i-dēr), n. [= D. eider (-royel) (= F. faul) = G. eider (-gans) (= E. goose), the eider, leel, athar (or pron. like F. i) = Sw. eider = Dan. eider (-fugl) (= F. faul).] 1. Same as eider-duck. — 2. Same as eider-down.

eider-down (i-dēr-doun), n. [Eider + down, after leel, athar -dun = Sw. eiderdun = Dan. eiderdun; cf. G. eiderdunen, D. eiderdons, F. édredon.] Down or soft feathers of the eider-duck, such as the bird plucks from its breast to line the nest or cover the eggs. The commercial down is chiefly obtained from the common eider, and is used in the manufacture of many beautiful fabrics, as coverlets, robes, flannels, muffs, etc. It is one of the very poorest conductors of heat, as well as an extremely light substance, thus preserving great warmth with very little weight.

eider-duck (i-dēr-duk), n. A duck of the subfamily Fuligininae and genus Somateria; especially, the common Somateria mollissima, which inhabits both coasts of the North Atlantic. It is much larger than the common duck, being about 2 feet long, and has a peculiarly gibbous bill with a pair of frontal processes. The male is almost entirely black and white in large masses, with the head tinged with green; the female is brown, variegated with gray, redder, and dusker shades in small patterns. The down with which these birds line their nests is copious, and is much valued for its extreme softness, warmth, and elasticity. The birds are practically domesticated in some places. The American bird, a slightly different variety from the European, is known as variety drusoides; it breeds abundantly in Labrador, Newfoundland, etc. The king eider-duck is a very distinct species, Somateria (Ereunetes) spectabilis, the gibbosity of the bill being different in shape, and the head tinged with blue as well as green. The Pacific eider-duck is S. euryzona, having a black V-shaped mark on the chin, but otherwise resembling the common eider. The spectacled eider-duck, Somateria (Arctonetta) hutchinsii, inhabits the northern Pacific; its bill is not gibbous, and it has no frontal processes, the feathers reaching beyond the nostrils. Steller's duck, Himantopus stelleri, is often called Steller's eider, and sometimes included in the genus Somateria. See Somateria.

The eider-duck, which swarmed on Farne Island when St. Cuthbert went to lead a lonely life there, became a great favourite with the holy man, . . . and St. Cuthbert's birds are they called to this day. Rock, Church of our Fathers, l. 378.

eider-duck (i-dēr-duk), n. Same as eider-duck.

eider-yarn (i-dēr-yarn), n. A soft woolen yarn made from the fleeces of merino sheep, sold in different colors for knitting and similar kinds of work.

eidograph (i-dō-graf), n. [Prop. idograph*, id, Gr. eidō, form, shape, figure, lit. that which is seen, idō = L. videre, see (see idea), + grāphō, write.] An instrument for copying designs, reduced or enlarged in any proportion within certain limits; a form of pantograph.

eidola, n. Plural of eidolon.

eidology (i-dō-lō-jī), n. [Prop. idology*, id, Gr. eidō, image (see idol), + -logia, lógos, speak: see -ology.] In philos., the theory of cognition; the explanation of the possibility of knowledge.

eidolon (i-dō-lon), n.; pl. eidola (-lā). [Also idolon (reg. L. form idolum, whence E. idol, q. v.), idōlon, image (see idol), + -logia, lógos, speak: see -ology.] In philos., the theory of cognition; the explanation of the possibility of knowledge. — 2. A shade or specter; an apparition; hence, a confusing reflection or reflected image.

Where an eidolon named Night oistoddof (ā'ist-odd-ōf), n.; pl. oistoddofa (ā'ist-odd-ōf-ā). [W. oistoddof, a sitting, a session, assembly,

esp. congress of bards or literati, < oistodd, sitting (as a verb, sit, be seated), + od, a mod.,
a circle, inclosure.] An assembly; a meeting;
specifically applied to a national assembly or congress of bards and minstrels held periodically in Wales. The oistoddof is a very ancient institution, but its modern form dates from about the twelfth century. It is designed to foster patriotism to encourage the study of the Welsh language and literature, and to promote the cultivation of the ancient bardic poetry and music of the principality. Since 1819 an oistoddof has been held almost every year. It usually attracts thousands of persons from all parts of the country, and lasts three or four days, which are devoted to orations and contests in poetry, singing, harp, etc., and prizes are awarded, amid much enthusiasm and ceremony, to the successful competitors. The proceedings are conducted partly in Welsh and partly in English. Similar meetings are sometimes held in the United States by citizens of Welsh origin.

1. Being one or the other of two, taken indif-ferently or as the case requires: referring to two units or particulars of a class: as, it can be done in either way; take either apple; the boat will land on either side.

Split it when they please,

Can either sex assume, or both.

Milton, P. L., l. 444.

2. Being one and the other of two; being both of two, or each of two taken together but viewed separately: as, they took seats on either side.

In the midst of the street of it, and on either side of the river, was there the tree of life.

Rev. xiii. 2.

The pastor was made to take his seat before the altar, with his two assistants, one on either side.

Prescott.

In this use, each or both, according to construction, is nearly if not quite always to be preferred. Properly, either refers both jointly to one or the other of two (and often in actual use, though less accurately, to some one of any number), each, definitely to every one of two or any larger number considered individually, a distinction of signification which ought to be maintained, since interchange of the words does prejudice by careful writers now than formerly offers no advantage but may create ambiguity. Both, two together, one and the other taken jointly, should be preferred when this is the specific sense; but both and each may often be interchangeably. Thus, the camp may be pitched on either side of the stream (on one or the other side indifferently); there were two camps, one on each side, the camp was pitched on both sides (one camp, divided, there are fine buildings on both sides of the street, or on each side, but not on either side.)

eject (ĕ-jekt'), n. [L. ejectum, neut. of ejectus, pp. of eicere, eicere, eject: see eject, v.] That which is ejected; specifically, in philos., a reality whose existence is inferred, but which is outside of, and from its nature inaccessible to, the consciousness of the one making the inference: thus, the consciousness of one individual is an eject to the consciousness of any other.

But the inferred existence of your feelings, of objective groupings among them, similar to those among my feelings, and of a subjective order in many respects analogous to my own, these inferred existences are in the very act of inference thrown out of my consciousness, recognized as outside of it, as not being a part of me. I propose, accordingly, to call these inferred existences ejects, things thrown out of my consciousness, to distinguish them from objects, things presented in my consciousness, phenomena. W. K. Clifford, Lectures, II. 72.

ejecta (ĕ-jekt'ā), n. pl. [L. pl. of ejectum, neut. of ejectus, pp. of eicere, eicere, eject: see eject, v.] Things that are cast out or away; refuse.

ejection (ĕ-jekt'shon), n. [L. ejectio (n.), < ejectus, pp. of eicere, eicere, eject: see eject, v.] 1. The act of ejecting, or the state of being ejected; expulsion; dismissal; dispossession; rejection.

Then followed those tremendous adventures, those perils by sea, by wreck, by false brethren, by envious searchers; those ejections upon islands, those labours by the way, which complete in me the portrait of St. Paul. Bale, in R. W. Dixon's Hist. Church of Eng., xxi.

Our first parent comforted himself, after his ejection out of Paradise, with the foresight of that blessed seed of the woman which should be exhibited almost four thousand years after. Bp. Hall, Select Thoughts, § 30.

Some of these alterations are only the ejections of a word for one that appeared to him more elegant or more intelligible. Johnson, Pref. to Shakespeare.

2. That which is ejected; matter thrown out or expelled.

They [laminated beds alternating with and passing into obolites] are only partially exposed, being covered up by modern ejections. Darwin, Geol. Observations, I. 62.

Action of ejection and intrusion, in Scots law, an action brought when lands or houses are violently taken possession of by another, for the purpose of recovering possession with damages and violent profits. — Letters of ejection, in Scots law, letters under the royal signet, authorizing the sheriff to eject a tenant or other possessor of land who had been decreed to remove, and who had disobeyed a charge to remove, proceeding on letters of hounding on the decree.

ejective (ĕ-jekt'iv), a. [< eject + -ive.] 1. Pertaining to ejection; casting out; expelling.

It was the one thing needful I take it, to prove that the sun is an orb possessing intense eruptive or ejective energy. Portmuthly Rev., N. S., XL. 422.

2. In philos., of the nature of an eject. [Recent.]

This conception symbolizes an indefinite number of ejects, together with one object which the conception of each eject more or less resembles. Its character is therefore mainly ejective in respect of what it symbolizes, but mainly objective in respect of its nature. W. K. Clifford, Lectures, II. 74.

ejectively (ĕ-jekt'iv-ly), adv. 1. By ejection. — 2. In philos., as an eject. [Recent.] Mental existence is already known to them ejectively, although, as may be concluded, never thought upon subjectively. N. A. Rev., (XI) 764.

ejectment (ĕ-jekt'ment), n. [< eject + -ment.] An ejecting or casting out; specifically, a dispossession; the act of dispossessing or ousting.

Driving him [the devil] out, in the face of the whole congregation, by exorcisms and spiritual ejectments. Warburton, Doctrine of Grace, II. 4.

Action of ejection, in law, a possessory action, whereby in the title to real property may be tried and the possession recovered, whenever the party claiming has a right of entry. See casual ejector, under casual.

ejector (ĕ-jekt'or), n. One who or that which ejects. Specifically — (a) In law, one who ejects another from or dispossesses him of his land. (b) A device for utilizing the momentum of a jet of steam or air under pressure to lift a liquid or a finely divided solid, such as sand, dust, or ashes. In the simplest form two pipes are placed one within the other, the larger one having a conical shape at the place where the smaller one enters it. A jet of steam or air passing from the smaller pipe upward into the larger pipe tends to cause any liquid, as oil or water, within reach to rise in the larger pipe. In oil-wells such a device is used to raise the oil to the surface. In another form of ejector, for lifting water, the smaller pipe enters a bend of the larger pipe near the top, the force of the jet tending to lift water through the pipe from below. The steam-ejector is also used to lift ashes from the furnace-room of a steamer and to discharge them through a pipe passing overhead above the water-line. The ejector is also used to exhaust the air of a vacuum-brake; in this case the steam-jet moves a column of air instead of water. (c) A device for throwing cartridge-shells from a firearm after firing. The common ejector of single- and double-barreled breech-loaders is a bolt underneath the gun-barrel, with a head fitted to the rim of the bore, working automatically back and forth in closing and opening the arm; in the latter movement the head catches against the rim of the shell and pushes it out of the barrel. There are many other devices, as a spring-lever, etc. — Casual ejector. See casual.

ejector-condenser (ĕ-jekt'or-kon-den'ser), n. In a steam-engine, a form of condenser operated by the exhaust-steam from the cylinder.

ejido (ĕ-hā'dō), n. [Sp., = Pg. exido, a common, < L. exitus, a going out, exit: see exit.] In Spanish and Mexican law, a common; a public inclosed space of land. By the laws of Spain pueblos or towns and their inhabitants were entitled to four square leagues of land for their general and common use. This tract was called the ejido. In the American law reports the word is used in the plural, and spelled variously ejidos, ehidos, exidos, exidos.

ejoo (ĕ'jō), n. [Of Malay origin.] The fiber of the gomuti.

ejulation (ĕ-j-lā'shon), n. [< L. ejulatio (n.), < ejulare, also dependent hejulari, wail, lament, < heu, hei, ei, an exclamation of grief or fear.] An outcry; a wailing; a loud cry expressive of grief or pain; mourning; lamentation.

No ejulation
Tolled her knell; no dying agony
Frown'd in her death. J. Beaumont, Psycho, xviii. 68.

Instead of hymns and praises, he breaks out into ejulations and effeminate wallings. Government of the Tongue.

ejuration (ĕ-j-rā'shon), n. [< L. ejuratio (n.), < ejuratio (n.), an abjuring, a resigning, < L. ejurare, ejurare, abjure, renounce, resign, < e, out, + jurare, swear.] Solemn disavowal or renunciation. Bailey, 1727.

eka. [< Skt. eka, one. Cf. dui.] In chem., a prefix attached to the name of an element and forming with it a provisional name for a hypothetical element which, according to the periodic system of Mendelejeff, should have such properties as to stand in the same group with the element to which the prefix is made and next to it. For example, eka-aluminium was the provisional name given by Mendelejeff to a hypothetical element which in the periodic system should have such properties as to stand in the same group as aluminium and next to it. The recently discovered element gallium agrees in properties with those ascribed to eka-aluminium, and this name is now abandoned.

eke (ĕk), v. t.; pret. and pp. eked, ppr. eking. [Early mod. E. also eke, eke; < ME. eken, also assimilated echen (> E. dial. etch), < AS. ecan, ēcan (pret. ēce, pp. ēced) (= OS. ēkan, ēcān = OHG. ōnhōn, ōnhōn, auhhōn = lecl. auka (pret. aukadhi) = Sw. öku = Dan. øge), increase, cause to grow; secondary form, prop. caus. of ēcan* (pret. ēce*, pp. ēcēn), only in the pp. cācēn (= OS. gēcan, giocan), as adj., increased, enlarged, made pregnant; = OS. ēwan = lecl. auka (pret. jōk) = Goth. aukān (pret. aiuk), intr., grow, increase; = L. augere, increase; prob. connected with Gr. aigazein, aigazein, increase, which is akin to E. az, increase. Hence eke, adv. and conj.] 1. To increase; enlarge; lengthen; protract; prolong.

God myghte not a poynte my joies eke.
Chaucer, Troilus, III. 1308

Spare, gentle sister, with reproach my paine to eke.
Spranger, F. Q., III. vt. 22.

2. To add to; supply what is lacking to; increase, extend, or make barely sufficient by addition: usually followed by out: as, to eke out a piece of cloth; to eke out a performance.

More bent to eke my smarts
Than to reward my trusty true intent,
She goes for me device a grievous punishment.

Spenser, F. Q., III. vii. 55.

In order to eke out the present page, I could not avoid parading the metaphor.

Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 5.

It was their custom, from father to son, to eke out the fugal support derived from this little domain by the business of a smith, to which the oldest son was habitually brought up.

Everett, Orations, II. 6.

eko (ék), n. [ME. eke, also assimilated eko, <
AS. edda, an increase, < edcan*, increase: see eko, v.] Something added to something else.
Specifically—(a) A short wooden cylinder on which a beehive is placed to increase its capacity when the bees have filled it with comb. [Scotch.]

Neighbour defines eko as half a hive placed below the main hive, while a whole hive used in the same way is called a "nadir."

Phin, Dict. Apiculture, p. 31.

(b) Same as eking, 2.

eko (ék), adv. and conj. [ME. eke, eek, ek, ec, ekbergite (ék'-bérj-it), n. [After the Swedish mineralogist Ekeberg.] A variety of scapolite.

ekenamet (ék'-nám), n. [ME. ekename, ekname (= Icel. auknafn = Sw. eknamn = Dan. egen-navn), an added name, < eko, an addition, increase, eken, add, + name, name: see eko and name. Hence, by misdividing an ekenamet as a ekename, the form nickname, q. v.] An added name; an epithet; a nickname. See nickname.

We have thousands of instances . . . of such eko-names or epithet-names being adopted by the person concerned.
Archæologia, XLIII. 110 (1871).

ekia (ék'-ki-á), n. The wild African dog.

eking (ék'-king), n. [Also eking; early mod. E.
also eking; < ME. eking, ekinge*; verbal n. of eko, v.] 1. The act of adding.

I dempt there much to have eeked my store,
But eek eeking hath made my hart sore.

Spenser, Shep. Cal., September.

2. That which is added. Specifically—(a) A piece of wood fitted to make good a deficiency in length, as the end of a knee of a ship and the like.

Eking is the name given to the timber which, resting upon the shelf, ekes out or fills up the spaces between the apron and the foremast beam, and between the stern post and aftermost beam—the deck hook and deck transom
... connecting the two sides.

Thearle, Naval Arch., § 210.

(b) The carved work under the lower part of the quarter-piece of a ship at the aft part of the quarter-gallery. Also eko.

eklogite, n. See eclogite.

el¹, n. An obsolete spelling of ell¹.

el², n. See ell².

el³, [L. el, < Gr. ēla, assimilation of ēv before 2.] An assimilated form of en² before l, as in el-lipse.

el¹, [ME. -el, < AS. -el, a noun-suffix, prob.
orig. same as -ere, E. -er. Cf. -al, -ar, and see -el. See -erl.] A suffix of Anglo-Saxon origin, forming nouns, originally denoting the agent, from verbs, as in runner: in modern English, except after n, usually written -le, as in bead-le, best-le, boot-le, etc. See -le.

el², [(1) OF. -el, mod. -el, -aux, m., -elle, f., < L.
-ellus, -ella, -ellum, parallel to -illus, etc., being usually dim. -ulus, with assimilation of a preceding consonant. The suffix -l (-lo, -lus, -el, etc.)
is a common Indo-European formative, with different uses, diminutive, agential, or adjective.
It appears also in -let, q. v. (2) See -al, etc.]

1. A suffix originally and still more or less diminutive in force, sometimes of Teutonic origin, as in hatch-el (hatch-le, heck-le), but usually of Latin origin, as in chapel, cup-el, tunn-el, etc.—2. A suffix of various origin, chiefly Latin, as in chatt-el, chann-el, kenn-el, etc. (where it represents Latin -alis, E. -al), feetn-el, funn-el, etc. See these words.

E lat (é-lá). In medieval music, the second E above middle C: so named by Guido, in whose system it was the highest tone; hence often used by the old dramatists to denote the extreme of any quality, but especially any extravagant or hyperbolic saying.

Necessitie . . . made him . . . stretch his braines as high as E lat to see how he could recouer pence to defray his charges.

Greene, Never Too Late.

There are some expressions in it (Dryden's "State of Innocence") that seem strain'd and a note beyond E la.

Langhorne, Dram. Poets (ed. 1801), p. 72.

elaboracy (é-lab'-rā-si), n. [elaborate, a.:
see -acy.] Elaboration. [Rare.]

A minute elaboracy of detail.

P. Robinson, Harper's Weekly, June 7, 1884, p. 367.

elaborate (é-lab'-rā-ti), v.; pret. and pp. elaborated, ppr. elaborating. [L. elaboratus, pp. of elaborare (> It. elaborare = Sp. Pg. elaborar = F. élaborer), labor greatly, work out, elaborate, <
e, out, + laborare, labor: see labor, v.] I. trans.
1. To produce with labor; work out; produce in general.

The honey, that is elaborated by the bee, . . . affords a great deal of pleasure to the bee herself.

Boyle, Works, II. 351.

Or, in full joy, elaborate a sigh. Fanny, Love of Fanny.

If the Orchidee had elaborated as much pollen as is produced by other plants, relatively to the number of seeds which they yield, they would have had to produce a most extravagant amount, and this would have caused exhaustion.

Darwin, Fertil. of Orchids by Insects, p. 288.

Specifically—2. To improve or refine by successive operations; work out with great care; work up fully or perfectly.

There has been up to the present day an endeavour to explain every existing form of life on the hypothesis that it has been maintained for long ages in a state of balance or else on the hypothesis that it has been elaborated, and is an advance, an improvement, upon its ancestors.

E. R. Lankester, Degeneration, p. 29.

Often . . . a speaker's thought is not weighty enough to sustain elaborated style of any kind, and, least of all, elaborated imagery.

A. Phelps, English Style, p. 28.

II. intrans. To be or become elaborate; be elaborated. [Rare.]

This custom of burying a dead man's movables with him elaborates as social development goes through its earlier stages.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Social, § 16.

elaborate (é-lab'-rā-ti), a. [= F. élaboré = Sp.
Pg. elaborado = It. elaborato, < L. elaboratus, pp.: see the verb.] Wrought with labor; finished with great care and nicety of detail; much studied; executed with exactness; highly finished; as, an elaborate discourse; an elaborate performance.

The Expressions are more florid and elaborate in these Descriptions than in most other Parts of the Poem.

Addison, Spectator, No. 721.

His style would never have been elegant, but it might at least have been manly and periphrastic, and nothing but the most elaborate care could possibly have made it so bad as it is.

Macaulay, Milford's Hist. Greece.

What an elaborate theory have we here,
Ingeniously nursed up, pretentiously brought forth! Browning, King and Book, I. 177.

Syn. Labored, perfected, highly wrought.

elaborately (é-lab'-rā-ti-ly), adv. In an elaborate manner; with elaboration; with nice regard to exactness.

I believe that God is no more moved with a prayer elab- orately pend, than man truly charitable is moved with the pen'd speech of a flatterer. Milton, Epiconchastes, xlv.

elaborateness (é-lab'-rā-ti-nēs), n. The quality of being elaborate, or wrought with great labor.

Yet it [the "Old Bachelor"] is apparently composed with great elaborateness of dialogue, and incessant imbition of wit.

Johnson, Congreve.

elaboration (é-lab'-rā-shon), n. [= F. elaboration = Sp. elaboración = Pg. elaboração = It.
elaborazione, < L. elaboratio = elaborare:
see elaborate.] 1. The act of elaborating, or working out or producing; production or formation by a gradual process; as, the elaboration of sap by a tree.

Elaboration is a gradual change of structure in which the organism becomes adapted to more and more varied and complex conditions of existence.

E. R. Lankester, Degeneration, p. 32.

2. The act of working out and finishing with great care and exactness in detail; the act of improving or refining by successive processes; painstaking labor.

It is not my design in these papers to treat of my subject . . . to the full elaboration. Hook, Works, IV. 246.

3. Labored finish or completeness; detailed execution; careful work in all parts; as, the elaboration of the picture in wonderful.

elaborative (é-lab'-rā-tiv), a. Serving, tending, or having power to elaborate; working out with minute attention to completeness and to details; laboriously bringing to a state of completion or perfection.—Elaborative faculty, in psychol., the intellectual power of discerning relations and of viewing objects by means of or in relations; the understanding, as defined by the German philosophers; the discursive faculty; thought: a phrase introduced by Sir William Hamilton.

elaborator (é-lab'-rā-tor), n. [= F. elabora-teur, < L. as if elaborator*, < elaborare, elaborate: see elaborate, v.] One who or that which elaborates.

elaboratory (é-lab'-rā-tō-ri), a. and n. [elaborate + -ory. As a noun, after laboratory.] I. a.
Elaborating; tending to elaborate. [Rare.]

II. n. A laboratory.

He shew'd us divers rare plants, caves, and an elaboratory.

Keelgin, Diary, Aug. 1, 1865.

In this retreat of mine, shall I have the use of mine elaboratory?

Scott, Kentworth, xviii.

elabrate (é-lā'-brāt), a. [NL. "elabratus, < L.
el, priv. + labrum, lip: see labrum.] Having no labrum: an epithet applied in entomology to the mouth when it has no distinct labrum or upper lip, as in the spiders and most Diptera.

Elacate (é-lak'-ā-tō), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐλακῆς, dial.
ἐλακῆς, ἐλακῆς, n. distaff.] The typical genus of fishes of the family Elacatidae. E. canadensis is a food fish of the Atlantic coast of North America and the West Indies, reaching a length of 6 feet and a weight of from 15 to 20 pounds. It is variously known as the sergeant fish, cutfish, hanta, cubby jaw or cobia, and crab-eater. See cut under cobia.

elacatid (é-lak'-ā-tid), n. A fish of the family Elacatidae.

Elacatidæ (é-lak'-ā-tid-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Elacate + -idæ.] A family of scombriform fishes, of fusiform shape, with depressed head, smooth scales, lateral line concurrent with the back, eight free spines representing the first dorsal fin, a long second dorsal and anal fin, and acule-ately lobed tail. The cranium is also characteristic. The type is the cobia or sergeant fish, Elacate canadensis. See cut under cobia.

elacatoid (é-lak'-ā-toid), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Elacatidæ.

II. n. An elacatid.

elachert (el'-ā-chert), n. Same as degote.
Elachistea (el'-ā-kis'-tē-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐλα-χιστός, superl. of ἐλαγος, small.] A small genus of olive-brown filamentous marine algae, belonging to the Phaeophyceae, which grow in small tufts attached to other algae, especially Phaeocoe.
The basal part of the tuft is composed of densely packed branching filaments, which at the surface branch corymbose ly, so as to form a layer of short filaments (paraphyses).
At the base of the latter are borne the sporangia and a series of long, unbranched filaments. Elachistea fusoides is the commonest species in Great Britain and America.

Elachistinae (el'-ā-kis'-tī-nō), n. pl. [NL., < Ela-chistus + -inae.] A subfamily of insects, of the parasitic hymenopterous family Chalcididae.
They have four jointed tarsal, slender hind thighs, distinct parapodes, and a submarginal vein reaching the costa without a break. The species are all parasitic, and some of the larvae spin irregular cocoons, differing in this respect from most other Chalcididae.

Elachistodon (el'-ā-kis'-tō-don), n. [NL., < Gr.
ἐλαχιστός, superl. of ἐλαγος, small, + δόντις (δόντις), tooth.] A genus of Indian colubrid form serpents of the subfamily Danypellinae, having ophiophagous teeth formed by enameled processes of cervical vertebrae projecting into the gullet (as in the genus Danypellia), but smooth scales, head little distinct from the body, a grooved maxillary tooth, and a loreal plate. E. westermanni is an example. Reinhardt, 1863.

Elachistus (el'-ā-kis'-tus), n. [NL. (Spinola, 1811), < Gr. ἐλαχιστός, superl. of ἐλαγος, small.]
The typical genus of Elachistinae (which see),

characterized by the one-spurred hind tibiae and metallic colors. In Europe 50 species have been described, and in North America 6; the latter are parasitic upon voracious larvae. Sometimes wrongly spelled Elachista.

Elaeagnaceae (el'ē-ag-nā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Elaeagnus + -aceae.] A small natural order of apetalous exogens, scattered over the northern hemisphere. They are trees or shrubs, covered with silvery or brown scales, and having alternate or opposite leaves, and small white or yellow flowers. There are only 3 genera, Elaeagnus, Hippophae, and Shepherdia, including about 25 species, of which 4 are American.

Elaeagnus (el'ē-ag'nus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑλαῖος, elaîos, a Barotian marsh-plant, perhaps myrica, sweet gale, < ἑλαία, olive-tree, + ἄγνος, equiv. to ἄγνος, a willow-like tree; see agnus castus, under agnus.] A genus of shrubs or small trees, the type of the order Elaeagnaceae, of about 20 species. The fruit, sometimes edible, is a spurious drupe formed of the fleshy calyx-tube enclosing about 30 species, sparsely scattered through tropical regions. E. croceum furnishes the saffron-wood of Natal. E. glauca is a native of Ceylon and Coromandel, and is known by the name of Ceylon tea.

Elaeodes (el'ē-ō'dēz), n. [NL. (Eschscholtz), as Elaeodes, < Gr. ἑλαῖος, elaîos, olive-tree, + οἶδος, oîdos, appearance.] A genus of beetles, of the family Tenebrionidae, containing large species with the tarsi spinose or setose, and the connate elytra partly embracing the body; so called from the oily fluid discharged by the insects when irritated. There are about 50 species, all of the United States, where they take the place of the species of Raps in the old world. E. obscura and E. guttata are examples; the latter is 1 1/2 inches long. The fluid, as in Raps, is secreted by two glands near the anus, and is sometimes ejected to a distance of three or four inches. It has a penetrating and indelibly offensive odor. Also spelled Elaedra.

elaeodochon (el'ē-ōd'ō-ken), n.; pl. elaeodochae (-kai). [< Gr. ἑλαῖος, elaîos, olive-tree, + δοχή, dochê, receptacle, contain.] The uropygial gland or rump-gland of a bird; the oil-gland, a kind of sebaceous follicle situated upon the pope's-nose at the root of the tail.

It is composed of numerous slender tubes or follicles, which secrete the greasy fluid, and the ducts of which, uniting successively in larger tubes, finally open by one or more pores, commonly upon a little nipple-like elevation. Birds press out a drop of oil with the beak, and dress the feathers with it, in the operation called preening. The gland is large and always present in aquatic birds, which have need of a waterproof plumage; it is smaller in land-birds, as a rule, and wanting in some. The character of the elaeodochon, whether it be bare or surmounted by a cluster of feathers, distinguishes various natural groups of birds.

elaeolite (el'ē-ō-lit), n. [< Gr. ἑλαῖος, elaîos, olive-oil, + λίθος, lithos, a stone.] A coarse massive variety of nephelite, of a waxy, greasy luster, and presenting various shades of green, gray, and red. The predominance of soda in its composition renders its alteration a frequent source of zeolites, as thomsonite. Also elaidite.

elaeolite-syenite (el'ē-ō-lit-si'e-nit), n. A rock composed essentially of the minerals elaeolite and orthoclase, and having a granitoid structure. With these minerals are very commonly associated others in lesser quantity, such as plagioclase, augite, hornblende, biotite, magnetite, apatite, zircon, sodalite, and sphene. The most important and classic occurrence of elaeolite-syenite is in southern Norway, where it is the repository of many interesting minerals and of several of the very rare metals, such as uranium, cerium, niobium, etc. Varieties of this rock containing considerable zircon have been frequently designated as zircon syenite; a variety from Alaska, Russia, with much mica, is known as micaceous; one from Mount Foya in Portugal, which was supposed to contain hornblende, as foyite; and one from Italy in Transylvania, containing sodalite and sphene, as adonte.

elaeometer (el'ē-ōm'ē-tēr), n. [< Gr. ἑλαῖος, elaîos, olive-oil, + μέτρον, metron, a measure.] A hydrometer for testing the purity of olive- and almond-oils by determining their densities. Also elaiometer.

elaeoptene (el'ē-ōp'tēn), n. [< Gr. ἑλαῖος, elaîos, olive-oil, + πτερόν, pteron, winged.] The liquid portion of volatile oils, as distinguished from the concrete or crystallizable portion, called stearoptene (which see). Also elapten, oleoptene.

elaeosaccharine (el'ē-ō-sak'a-rin), n. [< Gr. ἑλαῖος, elaîos, olive-oil, + σάκχαρος, sakcharos, sugar.] Containing both oil and sugar.

elaic (el'ē-ik), a. [< Gr. ἑλαῖος, elaîos, olive-tree; see oleic.] Same as oleic.

elaic acid (el'ē-ik'at), n. [< elaic + -acid.] In chem., a salt formed by the union of elaidic acid with a base.

elaide (el'ē-id'ik), n. [< Gr. ἑλαῖος (elaîos), equiv. to ἑλαία, the olive-tree, + -ide.] Of or pertaining to oleic acid or elain.—Elaidic acid, elaidic acid, a fatty acid forming crystalline leaflets, obtained from oleic acid by adding nitrous or hyponitrous acid.

elaidin, elaidine (el'ē-i-din), n. [< Gr. ἑλαῖος (elaîos), the olive-tree, + -in, -ine.] In chem., a fatty substance, white, crystalline, produced by the action of nitric acid upon certain oils, especially castor-oil.

elain, elaine (el'ē-in), n. [= F. elaine: < Gr. ἑλαῖος, olive-oil, + -in, -ine.] The liquid principle of oils and fats: same as olein.

elaïodic (el'ē-ōd'ik), a. [< Gr. ἑλαῖος, elaîos, olive-tree, + -ic.] Derived from castor-oil: as, elaïodic acid.

elaiometer (el'ē-ōm'ē-tēr), n. Same as elaiometer.

elaldehyde (el'ē-lā'dē-hid), n. [< Gr. ἑλαῖος (elaîos), oil, + aldehyde.] In chem., a solid polymeric modification of acetaldehyde, containing three molecules in one. Perhaps identical with paraldehyde.

Elamite (ē-lam-it), n. and a. [< Elam (see def.) + -ite.] 1. n. An inhabitant of ancient Elam, a country east of Babylonia, commonly regarded as corresponding nearly to the old province of Susiana in Persia (now Khuzistan).

II. a. Pertaining to Elam or the Elamites.

elampt (ē-lamp'), r. i. [< L. e, out, + El lamp: see lamp.] To shine.

As when the cheerful sun, elamping wide,
Gleams all the world with his uprising ray.
G. Fletcher, Christ's Victory and Triumph, 1.

This, indeed, is deformed by words neither English nor Latin, but simply barbarous, as elamping, elazon, deprecatum, purpured, glitterant, and many others.

Hallam, Introd. Lit. of Europe, iii. 3.

élan (ē-lān'), n. [Fr., < élancer, shoot, incite, refl. rush forward, dash: see elance.] Ardor inspired by enthusiasm, passion, or the like; dash.

elance (ē-lāns'), r. t. [< F. élancer, < é (L. e), out, + lancer, dart, hurl, < lance, a lance.] To throw or shoot; hurl; dart. [Rare.]

While thy unerring hand elanc'd
Another, and another dart, the people Joyfully repeated to!
Prior, tr. of Second Hymn of Callimachus.

Elance thy thought, and think of more than man.
Young, Night Thoughts, 1x.

eland (ē-lānd), n. [< D. eland, an elk (in South Africa applied to the eland), = G. elend, elen (> F. élan), elendthier, elk, < Lith. elnis = Pol. jelen = Oslng. jeleni, elk. See elk.] 1. The Cape elk, Oreos canna, a large bubaline antelope of South Africa, standing 5 feet high at the withers, and weighing from 700 to 900 pounds. Its flesh is much prized, especially the hams, which are dried and used like tongue. It has in consequence been almost extirpated in the neighborhood of Cape Colony, where it formerly abounded. Also called elk.

Eland (Oreos canna).

Our party was well supplied with eland flesh during our passage through the desert; and it being superior to beef, and the animal as large as an ox, it seems strange that it has not yet been introduced into England. Livingstone.

2. A name sometimes used for the moose.

elanet (el'a-net), n. [< Elanus + dim. -et.] A kite or glede of the genus Elanus. G. Currier.

Elaoides (el'ē-ōi'dēz), n. [NL. (G. B. Gray, 1848, after Vieillot, 1818), < Elanus + Gr. οἶδος.] A genus of birds, of the family Falconidae; the swallow-tailed kites. The tail is extremely long and deeply forked, the wings are long and pointed, the feet are small, and the bill is simple. The genus is related to Nauclerus, of which it is held by some to be a subgenus. The type is the swallow-tailed kite of the United States, which is white with a glossy black mantle, wings, and tail, and about two feet long, the tail forming more than half the length when full-grown.

Swallow-tailed Kite (Elaoides forficatus).

the one-seeded nut. Several species are cultivated for their ornamental silvery scurfy foliage, especially the olive, E. angustifolia, of Europe, and several variegated varieties from Japan. The silver-herry, E. argentea, with silvery berries, is a native of northern America.

Elais (ē-lā'is), n. [NL., no named in reference to palm-oil, yielded by the African species, < Gr. ἑλαῖος, olive-oil, oil in general, < ἑλαία, the olive-tree; see oil and olive.] A genus of palms, of 3 or 4 species, found in Africa and tropical South America, with low stems and pinnate leaves. The fruit is red or yellow, consisting of a fleshy and oblongous pericarp surrounding a hard nut. The oil-palm of Africa, E. guineensis, is common along the western coast, where the oil obtained from the fruit forms an article of food and export. It is also cultivated in Brazil and elsewhere. See palm-oil.

Elania (ē-lā'ni-l), n. [NL. (Sundevall, 1835, in the form Elania).] An extensive genus of small olivaceous flycatchers of Central America, of the family Tyrannidae, sometimes giving name to a subfamily Elaniinae. There are about 20 species of Elania proper, such as E. parvula, E. placens, etc. The name of the genus refers to the prevailing olivaceous coloration of the species. Also written Elanus, Elania, Elana.

Elaninae (ē-lā'ni-l'ā), n. pl. [NL., < Elania + -inae.] A subfamily of Tyrannidae, named from the genus Elania. The bill is in most cases compressed and but sparingly bristled, contrary to the rule in Tyrannidae; the feet are feeble and the wings generally short. The prevailing colors are olive greens and browns, whence the birds are collectively known as olive-tyrants. They are distributed over all the Neotropical region, reaching to the border of the United States. The limits of the subfamily are not fixed; Schater admits 10 genera. Also Elaninae, Elaninae, Elaninae, Elaninae.

elaeoblast (el'ē-ō-blāst), n. [< Gr. ἑλαῖος, elaîos, olive-oil, + βλαστός, blastos, germ.] In zool., the urochord of certain ascidians; a rudimentary notochord, occurring in the embryos of the salps.

The placenta becomes more sharply marked off from the body of the embryo, at the posterior end of which a structure known as the elaeoblast—the equivalent of the notochord—makes its appearance. . . . The embryo is born as a small fully developed salpa, which, however, still possesses the remains of the placenta and the elaeoblast.
(Class. Zoology (trans.), II. 107)

elaeoblastic (el'ē-ō-blāst'ik), a. [< elaeoblast + -ic.] Pertaining to the elaeoblast; composing the elaeoblast; as, elaeoblastic cells.

Elaeocarpus (el'ē-ō-kār'pus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑλαῖος, the olive-tree, + καρπός, karpós, fruit.] A genus of trees and shrubs, of the order Umbellales, containing 50 species, natives of India and Australia and the intervening islands. They have simple leaves and racemes of small flowers. The fruit is an oblong or globose drupe, consisting of a rough bony nut surrounded by a fleshy pulp. In India the fruit of several species is used in curries, or pickled like olives. Some species of Australia and New Zealand yield a light but very tough wood.

Elaeodendron (el'ē-ō-dēn'dron), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑλαῖος, the olive-tree, + δένδρον, dendron, a tree.] A castraceous genus of small trees or shrubs, of Elanus (el'-g-nus), n. [NL. (Savigny, 1809), < Gr. Elanus, drive, set in motion; see elastic.] A genus of small milvine birds, of the family Falconidae; the pearl kites. They have a weak bill and claws; very short tail, feathered part way down in front, but elsewhere finely reticulate; long, pointed wings; short, square, or emarginate tail, with broad feathers; and white coloration in part, tinged with pearl-gray, and relieved by black in masses. There are several species in warm and temperate countries. The black-winged kite, E. melanopterus, is an example. The white-tailed kite, E. glaucus or E. leucurus, is a common bird of the southern United States.

elastite (e-lā'-tīt), n. Same as elastite.

elapton (el-ā'-pōn), n. Same as elapton.

Elaphidion (el-ā'-fīd-i-on), n. [NL. (Serville, 1834), < Gr. Elaphos, a deer, + dim. suffix -ion.]

A genus of longicorn beetles, of the family Cerambycidae, containing species of moderate or a, larva; b, twig split open, showing in loose pupa; c, severed end of twig; d, beetle; e, basal joint of an antenna, showing the characteristic apices at the tip of the third and fourth joints; f, tip of elytron; g, h, i, j, k, head, maxilla, labrum, mandible, and antenna of larva.

Elaphidion parallelum, natural size

large size, with moderately long spinose antennae and rounded thorax. About 20 species are known, all from North America and the West Indies. E. parallelum is a common species in the northern and eastern United States, about half an inch long, and ashy-brown in color; its larva borers into oak and hickory. Also Elaphidion.

elaphine (el'-ā-fīn), a. [NL. elaphus, < Gr. Elaphos, a deer; see Elaphus.] Pertaining to the red deer, Cervus elaphus, or to that section of the genus Cervus which this species represents.

Elaphodus (e-lā'-fō-dus), n. [NL. (Milne-Edwards, 1872), irreg. < Gr. Elaphos, a deer, + iodos, form.] A genus of muntjacs or Cervulinae of China, represented by Michie's tufted deer, Ela- phodus michianus, formerly called Lophotrachus, having unbranched antlers and no frontal cutaneous glands.

Tufted Deer (Elaphodus michianus).

Elaphomyces (el-ā-fō-mī-sēs), n. [NL., < Gr. Elaphos, a deer, + myces, a mushroom.] A genus of subterranean fungi, belonging to the Tuberaceae. Elaphomyces granulatus, the common species, produces nearly spherical tuber-like conceptacles, varying from the size of a hazelnut to that of a walnut. The surface is covered with fine warts. The contents consist chiefly of the black spores, from 1 to 8 in each ascus.

Elaphridae (e-lā'-fīd-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Elaphrus + -idae.] A family of Coleoptera, named from the genus Elaphrus. Also Elaphridae, Elaphridae.

Elaphrus (e-lā'-fūs), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1801), < Gr. Elaphros, light in moving.] A genus of adelphagotus beetles, of the family Carabidae and subfamily Carabinae. They are of small size and stout form, with the elytra impressed, the mandi-bles setigerous, and the antennae free at the base. About 20 species are known, 11 of them North American. E. riparius, about a quarter of an inch long, is a common European species.

elaphure (el'-ā-fūr), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1801), < Gr. Elaphurus.] A large deer, Elaphurus davidianus, of northern China, remarkable for the strong development and branching of the brow-antler and an inverse reduction of the other antlers, but otherwise related to the red deer and other species of the genus Cervus.

Elaphurus (el-ā-fūr-us), n. [NL. (Milne-Edwards), < Gr. Elaphos, the stag, + oura, tail.] A genus of Cervidae related to the stag, but having a longer tail and inversely developed antlers. See elaphure.

Elaphus (el'-ā-fus), n. [NL. (Hamilton Smith, 1827), < Gr. Elaphos, a stag.] A genus of Cervidae, containing such large deer as the American elk or wapiti, E. (Cervus) canadensis. See cut under wapiti.

elapid (el'-ā-pīd), n. A serpent of the family Elapidae.

Elapidae (ē-lāp'-ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Elaps, the typical genus, + -idae.] A family of venomous serpents, of the suborder Proteroglypha, order Ophidia, typified by the genus Elaps. They have poison-glands and grooved poison fangs, behind which are usually solid hooked teeth, the palatine and pterygoid bones and the lower jaw having teeth also. The tail is not compressed. Species inhabit tropical and warm temperate regions of both hemispheres. Among them are the most poisonous of snakes, as the Indian cobra, Naja tripudians, and the Egyptian asp, A. haje. Others are much less to be dreaded, as the harlequin snake of the United States, Elaps fulvus. There are upward of 20 genera and numerous species. The family is restricted by Cope to forms lacking postfrontal bones, when most of the serpents usually placed in it are brought under Namer (which see). Also Elapidae. See cut under asp, cobra, de capello, and coral-snake.

elapidation (ē-lāp-i-dā'-shon), n. [NL. < Elapidae, cleared from stone, < el, out, + lapidatus, pp. of lapidare, throw stones at, < lapis (lapid-), a stone; cf. elapide.] A clearing away of stones. Bailey, 1731. [Rare.]

elapoid (el'-ā-pōid), a. [NL. < Elaps + -oid.] Resembling a serpent of the genus Elaps; belonging or related to the Elapidae; crotaliform, not crotaliform, as a venomous serpent.

Elaps (ē-lāps), n. [NL., a var. of elaps, < L. elaps; see Elaps.] A genus of venomous serpents, giving name to the family Elapidae, having two nasal plates. The species are beautifully ringed with black and red, and some of them are called coral-snakes, as E. coralina of tropical America, and harlequin snake, as E. fulvus of North America. See cut under coral snake.

elapse (ē-lāps'), v. i.; pret. and pp. elapsd, ppr. elapsing. [L. elapsus, pp. of elabi, glide away, < el, out, away, + labi, glide, full; see lapse.] 1. To slide, slip, or glide away; pass away with or as if with a continuous gliding motion; used of time.

veral years elapsed before such a vacancy offered itself by the death of the archbishop of London. Prescott, Ford and Lan, II, 1.

2. To pass out of view or consideration; suffer lapse or neglect.

Such great acts do facilitate our pardon, and hasten the restitution, and in a few days complete the elapsed duty of many months. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I, 180.

elapse (ē-lāps'), v. i. [L. < elapsus, < el, out, + lapse, < lappere, to pass.] The act of passing; lapse. [Rare.]

To sink themselves [the Pietists] into an entire repose and tranquillity of mind. In this state of silence to attend the secret elapse and flowings in of the Holy Spirit, that may fill their minds with peace and consolation, joys or raptures. Addison, Remarks on Italy (ed. Bohn, 1831).

After an elapse of years.

Annals of Phil. and Penn., I, 578.

Elapsidae (ē-lāp'-ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Elaps + -idae.] Same as Elapidae.

elapsion (ē-lāp'-shon), n. [L. < elapsus + -ion.] The act of elapsing; lapse. E. Phillips, 1700. [Rare.]

elaqueate (ē-lāk'-wē-at), v. i.; pret. and pp. elaqueated, ppr. elaqueating. [L. < elaqueatus, pp. of elaquare, disentangle, < el, out, + laquare, a snare.] To disentangle. Coles, 1717. [Rare.]

Elaspoda (el-ā-sīp'-ō-dā), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Elasmopoda.

elasmopod (e-lās'-mō-pōd), a. and n. I. a. Same as elasmopodous.

II. n. A member of the Elasmopoda.

Elasmopoda (el-ās-māp'-ō-dā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. Elaspis, Elaspis, a metal plate, + πούς (pōs) = foot.] An ordinal or other group of deep-sea holothurians. They exhibit distinct bilateral symmetry, having both a dorsal and a ventral surface, the ambulatory ambulacra confined to the latter, and the accephalic region usually specialized. About 50 species are known (all only recently), of several genera, as Elpadia, Edys, Trys, etc. Also Elaspoda.

elasmopodous (el-ās-māp'-ō-dus), a. Pertaining to the Elasmopoda. Also elasmopod.

Elasmis (e-lās'-mī-ē), n. pl. [NL.; cf. Elasmus.] A group of tineid moths. Hübner, 1810.

Elasmines (el-ās-nū'-nē), n. pl. [NL. (Howard, 1886), < Elasmus + -inae.] A subfamily of Chalcididae, represented by the genus Elasmus, having four-jointed tarsi and swollen hind thighs. Also Elasminidae.

elasmobranch (e-lās'-mō-brang'), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Elasmobranchii.

II. n. A vertebrate of the group Elasmobranchii.

elasmobranchian, elasmobranchiate (e-lās-mō-brang'-ki-an, -ki-āt), a. and n. Same as elasmobranch.

Elasmobranchii (e-lās-mō-brang'-ki-ī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. Elaspis or Elaspis, a metal plate (see Elasmus), + branchia, gills.] A class, subclass, or order of fishes, otherwise known as Chondropterygii and Selachii, including the sharks and skates; so named from the lamellar branchiae, or plate-like gills. These lamelliform gills are fixed both at their distal and proximal ends, so that they separate the branchial cavity into as many chambers as there are branchiae. The group is characterized by the cartilaginous skeleton, with the cranial elements not sutured together, the usually heterocercal tail, with the spinal column running into the upper lobe; the presence of pectoral and ventral fins; the mouth generally inferior, tum or prolongation of the mesothmoid bone prominent and perfectly ossified. E. bairdi, the type, is a large Nicaraguan species about 40 inches long and 22 high. E. dovei is another Central American form. See cut under tapir.

2. A genus of extinct chimaeroid fishes, later (1888) called Elasmodectes. Egerton.

Elasmoidæ (el-as-moi'dō), n. pl. [NL., < Elasmus + -oidæ.] Same as Elasmine. Förster, 1856.

elasmosaur (e-las'mo-saur), n. A reptile of the genus Elasmosaurus or family Elasmosauridae.

Skeleton of an Elasmosaurus (Elasmosaurus platyrus).

Elasmosauridæ (e-las-mo-saur'i-dō), n. pl. [NL., < Elasmosaurus + -idæ.] A family of extinct natural reptiles, taking name from the genus Elasmosaurus.

Elasmosaurus (e-las-mo-saur'), n. [NL. (Cope, 1868), < Gr. elasma, Elasma, a thin plate, + saurus, lizard.] An American genus of extinct reptiles, of the order Sauropsid, related to the plesiosaurs, but differing in the structure of the pectoral arch. A species was upward of 10 feet long, aquatic and piscivorous, with a very long neck, small head, paddle-like limbs and tall, and long, sharp teeth.

Elasmotheriidæ (e-las'mo-the-ri'i-dō), n. pl. [NL., < Elasmotherium + -idæ.] A family of extinct perissodactyl quadrupeds, without canines or incisors, and with a crenulated longitudinal ridge on the lower molars: a group having relationships with both the horses and the rhinoceros, but much more closely related to the latter in the order of ungulates. Gill, 1872.

Elasmotherium (e-las-mo-the-ri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. elasma, a thin plate, + thērion, a wild beast.] The typical genus of the family Elasmotheriidae.

Elasmus (e-las'mus), n. [NL., < Gr. elasma, (also elasma), a metal plate, < elavon (elav), drive, strike, beat out; see elastic.] A genus of parasitic hymenopterous insects, of the family Chalcididae, representing the subfamily Elasminæ, having four-jointed tarsi, enlarged hind femora, and the antennae ramosa in the male. The species are all of small size and some are secondary parasites - that is, parasites of parasites. E. pallatus is a North American example. Westwood, 1835.

Elassoma (el-a-sō'mā), n. [NL. (Jordan, 1877), < Gr. as if elassoma, a diminution, loss, defect, defeat, < elassein, make less, < elassein, loss, compar. of elassein, little, small.] A genus of very small fresh-water fishes of North America, representing the family Elasmidae.

elassome (el'a-sōm), n. A fish of the family Elasmidae. D. S. Jordan.

Elasmoidæ (el-a-sōm'i-dō), n. pl. [NL., < Elasmosoma + -idæ.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, represented by the genus Elasmosoma. They have an oblong compressed body covered with rather large cycloid scales, no lateral line, unpaired opercular bones, conic teeth in the jaws, and toothless palate; the dorsal fin is short and has about 4 spines, the anal still smaller with 3 spines, and the ventral thoracic and normal, with 1 spine and 3 rays. Only two species are known; they inhabit sluggish streams and ponds of the so-called United States, and are among the smallest of fishes rarely exceeding 14 inches in length. Also Elasmoidæ.

elasmoid (e-las'o-moid), n. and a. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Elasmoidæ.

II. n. An elassome.
elastic (ē-lās'tik), a. and n. [Formerly also elastick (first recorded in the form elastick: see first quot.): = F. élastique = Sp. elástico = Pg. elástico (cf. D. G. elastisch = Dan. Sw. elastisk), < NL. elastikus (NGr. elastikos), elastic, < Gr. as if elassein, for elassein, equiv. to elassein, a driver, hurler (see elater), < elassein (elasse), drive, set in motion, push, strike, beat out.] I. a. 1. Serving, as a catapult, to hurl missiles by the force of a spring.

By what elastick engines did the rear
The stary roof, and toll the orb in air?
Sir R. Blackmore.

2. Having, as a solid body, the power of returning to the form from which it is bent, extended, pressed, pulled, or distorted, as soon as the force applied is removed; having, as a fluid, the property of recovering its former volume after compression. A body is perfectly elastic when it has the property of resisting a given deformation equally, however that deformation may have been produced, whether slowly or suddenly, etc. All bodies, however, have different elasticities at different temperatures, and if the deformation is so sudden as to change the temperature of the body and so alter its resistance to deformation, this is not considered as showing it to be imperfectly elastic.

For the more easy understanding of the experiments triable by our engine, I thought it not superfluous nor unreasonable, in the recital of this first of them, to insinuate that notion by which it seems likely that most, if not all of them, will prove explicable. Your Lordship will easily suppose that the notion I speak of is that there is a spring, or elastical power, in the air we live in. By which elastical power, in the air, that which I mean is this: that our air either consists of, or at least abounds with, parts of such a nature that in case they be bent or compressed by the weight of the incumbent part of the atmosphere, or by any other body, they do endeavor, as much as in them lieth, to free themselves from that pressure, by bearing against the contiguous bodies that keep them bent; and as soon as those bodies are removed, or reduced to give them way, by presently unbending and stretching out themselves, either quite, or so far forth as the contiguous bodies that resist them permit, and thereby expanding the whole parcel of air these elastical bodies compose. Boyle, Spring of the Air (1680).

A body is called elastic in which a particle moved from its natural position of equilibrium has a tendency to return to its first position as soon as the external cause which had displaced it has ceased. Blacina, Sound (trans.), p. 4.

Figuratively—3. Admitting of extension; capable of expanding and contracting, according to circumstances; hence, yielding and accommodating: as, an elastic conscience; elastic principles.

A volunteer navy may in some degree supply the place of privateers, supposing that plenty of time and an elastic organization are at command.

J. R. Soley, Blockade and Cruisers, p. 160.

4. Possessing the power or quality of recovering from depression or exhaustion; able to resist a depressing or exhausting influence; capable of sustaining shocks without permanent injury: as, elastic spirits.

The herds are elastic with health. Landor.

Curve of elastic resistance. See curve. Elastic belting, a material made in bands from half an inch to several inches in width, plain or striped, and having thin strips of India-rubber lying in the direction of its length and covered by woven material of cotton, silk, or the like, which completely conceals the India-rubber, unless the belting is stretched. The threads of rubber are usually square in section, having been cut from thin sheets—Elastic bitumen. Same as elastite.—Elastic button. See button.—Elastic cartilage, cartilage represented in the pharynx, the epiglottis, and elsewhere, which is opaque, yellowish, flexible, and tough, and in which the matrix except in the immediate vicinity of the cells is permeated by numerous elastic fibers. Elastic curve. See curve.

Elastic fabric, a cloth or ribbon into which threads of rubber called shirra are woven.—Elastic fibers, in anat., fibers of elastic quality traversing the intercellular substance of connective tissue. They are of a light-yellow color, branch and anastomose freely, and strongly resist chemical treatment.—Elastic flannel. See flannel.—Elastic fluid, a fluid which has the property of expanding in all directions on the removal of external pressure, as gases and vapors. See gas.—Elastic glue. See glue.—Elastic gum, India-rubber.—Elastic mineral pitch, a brown, massive, elastic variety of bitumen.—Elastic mold, a mold of glue used for copying casts.—Elastic tissue, in anat., connective tissue made elastic by the presence of abundant elastic fibers. Such tissue is found in the middle coat of arteries, the larynx, Eustachian tube, yellow ligaments of the vertebrae, etc., and forms in some animals the ligamentum nuchæ. Mixed with cartilage, it constitutes a variety of the latter known as yellow or elastic fibrocartilage. Elastic type, a type made of roller-composition (glue, glycerin, and sugar) or prepared gutta-percha, which yields under impression: used generally in the form of a stereotype for hand-stamping with ink, for which elasticity is desirable.—Elastic webbing, a material similar to elastic belting, but of greater width.

II. n. A piece or strip of India-rubber, or of webbing or belting made elastic by the incorporation of India-rubber, used as a band, garter, or the like. [U. S.]

elastical (ē-lās'ti-kal), a. [See elastic.] Same as elastic.

elastically (ē-lās'ti-kal-i), adv. In an elastic manner: with elasticity or power of accommodation.

Comedy . . . elastically lending itself to the tone and taste of the times without sacrificing the laws of its own being. A. W. Ward, Eng. Dram. Lit., Int., p. xxv.

elastician (ē-las'tish'an), n. [< elastic + -ian.] A person devoted to the advancement of the knowledge of elasticity.

elasticity (ē-las'tis'i-ti), n. [= F. élasticité = Sp. elasticidad = Pg. elasticidade = It. elasticità = D. elastichheit = Gr. elasticitās = Dan. Sw. elasticitet, < NL. elasticitas* (f-s), elasticity, < elastikos, elastic: see elastic and -ity.] The property of being elastic, in any sense; especially, that physical force resident in the smallest sensible parts of bodies, by virtue of which the holding of them in a state of strain (change of size or shape) involves work, which for small strains is proportional to the square of the amount of the strain. There are different kinds of elasticity, corresponding to the different kinds of strain.

If the restitution of a springy body, forcibly bent, proceed only from the endeavor of the compressed parts themselves to recover their former state, one may not impertinently take notice of the elasticity that iron, silver and brass acquire by hammering.

Boyle, Great Effects of Motion.

On the fingers of the queen were ten gold rings, the hoops of which were not continuous, but open like bracelets to admit of elasticity.

C. T. Newton, Art and Archaeol., p. 382.

Never did the finances of the country give stronger evidence of vitality, soundness, and elasticity than was produced when Lowe, on opening the budget of 1871 on April 20, showed the yield of the revenue for 1870-1 to have exceeded the estimate by two millions and a quarter.

S. Lowell, Taxes in England, II. 262.

He [Berkeley] returned . . . to have the primacy of Ireland within his reach. But we always feel that he has not the same elasticity and heartiness of life as before.

Scotman (newspaper).

Axis of elasticity, axis of direct elasticity. See axis.—Coefficient of elasticity. See coefficient.—Elasticity of bulk, resistance to change of bulk.—Elasticity of shape, resistance to change of shape.—Fresnel's surface of elasticity, a surface whose radii vectors are proportional to the square roots of the elastic forces which, upon Fresnel's theory of light, are exerted in the directions of those radii round any point of a crystalline body.—Light-elasticity. See light.—Limit of elasticity, an amount of deformation which if applied to a body is such that if made any greater the body will not completely spring back when released.—Modulus of elasticity, the ratio of stress to strain: also termed the elasticity simply. See modulus.—Perfect elasticity, the property of being perfectly elastic. See elastic, a., 2.

elasticness (ē-lās'tik-ness), n. Elasticity. Bailey, 1727. [Rare.]

elastin (ē-lās'tin), n. [< elast-ic + -in.] In chem., a body closely resembling albumen, except that it is free from sulphur, forming the principal substance of the elastic fiber which is the characteristic constituent of certain tissues.

elatchee (ē-lach'ē), n. [< Hind. elāchi, elāchi.] (Urdu word).

elate (ē-lāt'), v. t.; pret. and pp. elated, ppr. elating. [< L. elatus, pp. of efferre, bring out, lift up, < ex, out, + ferre, carry (= E. bear), pp. latus; see abative, and cf. collate, delate, delate, dilate, illate, prolate, relate, etc., and offerent.] 1. To raise; exalt; elevate.

From whence the Tallmanian with elated voyces, for they use no bells, doe congregate the people, pronouncing the Arabick sentence, there is but one God, and Mahomet his Prophet. Sandys, Travels, p. 24.

Turn we a moment Fancy's rapid flight
To vigorous souls, and climes of far extent;
Where, by the potent sun elated high,
The vineyard swells refulgent on the day.

Thomson, Autumn.

2. To raise or swell, as the mind or spirits; elevate with satisfaction or gratification; puff up; make proud.

Though elated by his victory, he still maintained the appearance of moderation.

Hume, Hist. Eng.

He [Gilbert White] brags of no fine society, but is plainly a little elated by "having considerable acquaintance with a tame brown owl."

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 2.

elate (ē-lāt'), a. [< MF. elat, < L. elatus, pp.: see the verb.] 1. Raised; lifted up. [Poetical and archaic.]

And sovereign law, that state's collected will,
O'er thrones and globes, elate, Sits empress. Sir W. Jones.

2. Exalted in feeling; elated.

This king of kings proud was and elate;
He wende that god, that sit in majesty,
No myght hym nat blyve of his catast.

Chaucer, Monk's Tale (ed. Skeat), B. 5357.

Those promising youths, . . . like sons of the morning, elate with empty hopes and glittering outside.

Baron, Moral Fables, I. Epil.

Who feels his freehold's worth, and looks elate,
A little prop and pillar of the state.

Crabbe, Works, I. 178.

= Syn. 2. Exultant, jubilant, exhilarated, overjoyed, puffed up, proud.

elatedly (ē-lāt'ed-li), adv. With elation.

Nero, we find, defiled most in the foulest mires of luxury and where do we find any so elatedly proud, or so unjustly rapacious as he?

Felliam, On Luke xiv. 20.

elatedness (ē-lāt'ed-ness), n. The state of being elated. Bailey, 1731.

elatement (ē-lāt'ment), n. [< elate + -ment.] The act of elating, or the state of being elated; mental elevation; elation.

A sudden elatement swells our minds.
Hervey, Meditations, II. 54.

elbow-piece (el'hô-pô) n. Same as elbow.

elbow-plate (el'bo-plät'), n. 1. In paper-making, the cutter of the rag-cutting machine when bent to an angle in the middle. — 2. An early name for the cubitière, denoting especially the simple form used during the thirteenth century. See cut under armor (fig. 2).

elbow-rail (el'bo-räl'), n. In a railroad-car, a part of the body-framing running horizontally along the sides at about the height of the elbow of a passenger in a sitting position. Car-Builders' Dict.

elbow-room (el'bo-rüm), n. Room to extend the elbows; hence, freedom from confinement; ample room for motion or action.

Now my soul hath elbow room. Shak., K. John, v. 7.
No sooner is he disappointed of that harbour than God provides cities of Babylon; Saul shall die to give him elbow room. Sp. Hall, Abner and Joab.

elbow-scissors (el'bo-siz'orz), n. pl. Scissors which, for convenience in cutting, have a bend in the blade or shank.

elbow-shaker (el'bo-shä'kér), n. A dancer; a shaker; a gambler. Hallwell. [Old slang.]

elbow-shield (el'bo-shöld), n. The piece of armor protecting the elbow; a cubitière. See cuts under armor (figs. 2 and 3). Hewitt.

elbow-sleeve (el'bo-slév), n. A sleeve in a woman's dress, terminating at the elbow.

elbow-tongs (el'bo-töngz), n. pl. A pair of heavy tongs with curved jaws.

elbuck (el'buk), n. A Scotch form of elbow.

elcaja (el-kä'já), n. An Arabian tree, Trichilia emetica, the fruit of which is emetic, and also is sometimes used in the composition of an ointment for the cure of the itch.

Elkesaite, Elkesaite (el-kä'-it, el-kä'sä-it), n. One of a party or sect among the Jewish Christians of the second century, deriving their name from Elkasai or Elxai, either their founder or leader, or the title of the book containing their doctrines, which they regarded as a special revelation. Their belief and practices were a mixture of Gnosticism and Judaism, with much that was peculiar. They were finally confounded with the Ebionites.

elchi, elchee (el'chi, -che), n. [Turk. and Pers., < Hind. elchi, an ambassador, envoy.] An ambassador or envoy. Also spelled elchi.

Things which they had told to Colonel Roke they did not yet dare to tell to the great Elchi (Lord Stratford de Redcliffe). Kinako eld (old), n. [= So. eld, < ME. eld, elde, velde, earlier ylde, < AS. ylde, ylto, rarely aldn, ald, old, old age, an age, antiquity (= OS. eldi = OHG. alt, elti = Icel. öld = Dan. ælde = Goth. alds, age, an age), < eald, old: see old and world.] 1. Age; said of any period of life.

Fyfe hundredth wynter I am of elde,
Me think ther gylts as yestreday. York Plays, p. 43.

Last myghte the faylled
In thyne olde elde. Piers Plowman (B), xii. 8.

That faire child was of foure yer old
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), I. 3408

2. Old age; senility; also, an old person.
Weake old hath left thee nothing wise.
Spenser, F. Q., II. lib. 10

The weak fantasy of indigent old. Lamb, Witches

Time hath rotted what's in my soul enjoy'd,
And with the ill of old mine earlier years alloy'd.
Byron, Child Harold, II. 98

Green boyhood proves there,
And wanting old, pleading a youthful soul,
Intreats admission. Southery.

3. An age; an indefinitely long period of time.
The thrillede werldes olde cam quanne [when] Thare begat Abram. Genesis and Exodus, l. 705.

4. Time.
This storie olde, . . .
That olde which al can trete and bite . . .
Hath nygh devoured out of our memory:
Chaucer, Anelida and Arrete, l. 10.

5. Former ages; old times; antiquity.
Traditions of the salut and sage,
Tales that have the time of age,
And chronicles of old.
Longfellow, Prelude

[Obsolete or poetical in all uses.]

eldi, a. An obsolete variant of old.

eldr, v. [< ME. elden, become old, tr. make old, < AS. ylidan, aldian, delay, tr. put off, delay, prolong, < eald, old: see old, a., and old, v. (of which eld, v. is a doublet), and eld, n.] I, trans. 1. To become old; grow old.

Vortu stillis ne sholde nat elden.
Chaucer, Boethius, II. prose 7.

Time . . . had maad his elde
So lily. Rom. of the Rose, l. 396.

2. To delay; linger. Ps. Cott.

II. trans. To make old.

Time that eldith our successours, and eldith kings and emperours.

elden (el'den), n. A dialectal form of elding.

elder (el'dér), a. compar. [< ME. elder, eldere, eldre, elther, alder, aldr, eldre, eldre, < AS. yltra, eldra (= OFries. alder, elder = OS. aldira = OHG. alter, MHG. elter, < al, alter = Icel. eltri, eltri = Dan. ælde = Sw. ælde), compar. (with unlaut) of eald, old. The compar. elder is modern, < old + -er: see old. (cf. elder, n.) 1. Older; senior; having lived a longer time; born, produced, or formed before something else: opposed to younger.

Sadowne his brother that was elther than she Mertin (E. E. T. S.), III. 472.

The elder shall serve the younger.
Gen. xiv. 23

His elder son was in the field
Luke xv. 25.

After fifteen Months Imprisonment, K. Richard is released, and returns into England four Years elder than he went out.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 64.

2. Prior in origin or appointment; preceding in the date of a commission; senior: as, an elder officer or magistrate.

You wrong me, Brutus,
I said an elder soldier, not a better
Shak., J. C., iv. 3.

He (Dryden) may very well have preferred Romanism because of its elder claim to authority in all matters of doctrine.
Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 77.

3. Prior in time; earlier; former.

In elder times, when meritment was.
Rohn Hood and the Beggar (Child's Ballads, V. 252).

In the elder days of Art,
Builders wrought with greatest care.
Longfellow, The Builders.

The account of this . . . is so strongly characterized by the simplicity of elder times . . . that I shall venture to read an extract from the author who relates it.
Everett, Orations, II. 80.

The North Devon coast has the primary merit of being, as yet, virgin soil as to railways. I went accordingly from Barnstable to Hfcombe on the top of a coach, in the fashion of elder days.
H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 36.

One who is older than another or others: an elderly person.

To fructify also this is honest
That yonger men obeye unto thaire eldron
In governance, as good and buxom children.
Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 6

At the board, and in private, it very well becomes children's innocency to pray, and then elders to say Amen.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity

He led a blooming bride,
And stood a wither'd elder at her side.
Crode, Parish Register.

The tavern-hours of mighty wits,
Thine elders and thy betters.
Tranquon, Will Waterproof.

2. A forefather; a predecessor; one of a former generation in the same family, class, or community.

By it [faith], the elders obtained a good report.
Meb. xl. 2.

Carry your head as your elders have done before you.
Sir R. L. Estrange.

3. In the Old Testament, a title of indefinite signification applied to various officers, but generally indicating in the earlier history the princes or heads of tribes, and afterward men of special influence, dignity, and authority in their local community. In the New Testament the elders are the lay element in the Sanhedrin, the supreme court of the Jewish nation in the first century.

Gather unto me all the elders of your tribes, and your officers, that I may speak these words in their ears.
Deut. xxxi. 28.

Her husband is known in the gates, when he sitteth among the elders of the land.
Prov. xxxi. 22.

In the first instance, at any rate originally, the head of the first house was always the head of the clan, that of the first clan also that of the tribe. All these three grades of the heads of the people, who would thus reach the total of 1,728, might certainly be also designated by one common name, and in all probability this was furnished by the name "head" or "father," also more definitely the "head of the fathers," but more frequently by the name we so often meet with elder.

Ewald, Antiq. of Israel (trans.), p. 245.

4. In the New Testament, also the title of certain officers in the Christian church, whose functions are not clearly defined, but who apparently exercised a considerable control in the conduct of the local churches. Scholars are not agreed as to the limits or nature of their authority. The Presbyterians maintain that there were two classes of elders (1 Tim. v. 17; 1 Cor. xii. 28; Rom. xii. 6-8; Acts xv. 25, 26, xx. 28; Heb. xiii. 7, 17). The Congregationalists on the one hand, and the Episcopalians on the other, maintain that there was no distinction between ruling and teaching elders, the elder or presbyter being in their judgment identical with the pastor or shepherd of the flock (Acts xx. 28; 1 Thes. v. 12; Heb. xiii. 7, 17; 1 Tim. v. 17).

Elder is the translation of the equivalent word, which we still preserve in its Greek form of presbyter, and which is contracted through the old French forms prester and prestre, into priest. Smith, N. T. Hist., p. 447, note.

5. In certain Protestant churches, an officer exercising governmental functions, either with or without teaching or pastoral functions. (a) In churches of the Baptist persuasion the pastors of churches are usually called elders, although the class especially so called are not settled pastors, but evangelists and missionaries. (b) (1) In churches of the Presbyterian order the pastor of a church is technically called the teaching elder, as distinguished from the ruling elders, commonly called simply elders, who are a body of laymen, varying in number, selected to assist the pastor in the oversight and government of the church. The board of ruling elders constitute with the pastor the session of the church, and are intrusted with its government and discipline, subject to the supervision of the Presbytery. Such elders are required to accept the Symbol or Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church; they do not administer the sacraments, but aid in the Lord's supper by distributing the elements. They are sometimes elected for life, sometimes only for a term of years. (2) In the early days of Congregationalism many churches had, besides the pastor and teacher, a ruling elder, charged with matters of church government and discipline.

The congregation at Watertown (whereof Mr. George Phillips was pastor) had chosen one Richard Brown for their elder.
Wentworth, Hist. New England, I. 81.

I judge it not lawful for you, being a ruling Elder, . . . opposed to the Elders that teach & exhort and labor in ye word and doctrine, to which ye sacraments are annexed, to administer them, nor convenient if it were lawful.

Robinson, Quoted in Bradford's Plymouth Plantation, pp. 167.

(c) In some bodies of American Methodists elder is the general term for any clergyman. In the Methodist Episcopal Church the presiding elder is an ordained clergyman appointed by and serving under the bishop as superintendent, with large though carefully defined supervisory powers within a specified "district," which usually corresponds somewhat in extent to an average county in an eastern State. In this district every minister is amenable to him, and every church is subject to his supervision and is usually visited by him three or four times during the year. He presides at Quarterly and often at District Conferences. Traveling elders are itinerant preachers appointed by the Annual Conference. (d) In the Mormon Church the elder is an officer whose duty it is "to preach and baptize; to ordain other elders, and also priests, teachers, and deacons, to lay on hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost; to bless children; and to take the lead of all meetings." The elders constitute the Melchizedek priesthood, and include the apostles, the Seventy, the evangelists or patriarchs, and the high priest. Mormon Catechism, xvii. (e) Among the Shakers, four elders, two males and two females (the latter also called eldresses), have charge of each of the aggregated families.

elder (el'dér), n. [(1) < ME. elder, eldre, eldyr (with excrement d), eller, also elern, ellarne (whence mod. dial. eller, eldern, ellern, ellern), < AS. ellen, the usual form, but earlier ellern (in a Kentish gloss) = MLG. elhorn, alhorn, altherne, etc., LG. ellorn, elern, the elder-tree. (2) Another form appears in E. dial. hilder, < ME. hilder, hiller, hillor, hillerne, hellerne (generally, like the other ME. forms, in connection with tree) = D. halder (-boom) (now elir, elir-boom) = Norw. hyll, hyll-træ = Sw. hyll, hyll-trä = Dan. hyld, hyld-træ, elder, elder-tree. (3) A third form appears in OHG. holantar, holantar, MHG. holander, holder, holder, holder, holder, holder, dial. holder. It is doubtful whether these three forms are ultimately identical. Popular etym. has wrought confusion, e. g., in assimilating the forms with those of alder; cf. ME. elder, mod. dial. eller, LG. ellern, G. eller, alder. The third form, OHG. holantar, etc., appears to consist of hol, the root of the word, popularly supposed to be identical with hol, mod. G. kohl, = AS. hol, hollow, + -an = AS. -en, inflexive or deriv. suffix, + -ar, MHG. -der, prob. (as in OHG. maszel-træ, MHG. maszeler, G. massholder = AS. maszeldar, -dor, -dern, maple-tree) cognate with tree: cf. the Scand. forms with -træ, -trä, -træ. Some El Dorado (el dō-rā'dō), [Sp., lit. the golden: el, the (< L. ille, that); dorado, pp. of dorar, gild; see dorado and deaurat.] A country rich beyond all precedent in gold and jewels, which the early Spanish explorers believed to exist somewhere in the new world, and which Orellana averred that he had found in his voyage down the Amazon in 1540-41. This was soon disproved, but the search was continued down to the eighteenth century, and the name has become a synonym for any region said to abound in the means of easily acquired wealth. It was used with specific reference to California for some years after the discovery of gold there in 1848. Sometimes written as one word: as, the Eldorado of the West.

My sick brother, as in hospital madmen do, then dreamt of Paradises and El Dorados, which are far from these.

Carle.

In Eldorado, we are told, the children in the streets play with nuggets of gold instead of marbles.

Fortnightly Rev. N. S., XI. 98.

elecampane (el-ē-kum-pān'), n. [Formerly elecampane, alecampane, alcampane, hellecampane (the first part being altered appar. in simulation of the L. name helentum = Gr. ἡλενιον (> AS. elcan); < OF. enale-campaine, < ML. inula campana, elecampane; L. mula, elecampane, perhaps an accom. of helentum, < Gr. ἡλενιον, a plant supposed to be elecampane; ML. campana, prob. for campania, fem. of campanius, campanus, of the field, < L. campus, a field: see campaign, champagne.]

1. The common name of Inula Helentum, a coarse stout composite plant, a native of central Europe and Asia, sometimes cultivated, and often found naturalized in meadows and pastures in the eastern United States. It was one of the most famous of old medicines, having a special reputation in all pulmonary affections, and it is still used as a domestic remedy for various complaints.

Seed-pearl were good now, boiled with syrup of apples, Tincture of gold and coral, citron pills, Your elecampane root, myrrhine.

R. James, Volpone III. 2.

2. A coarse sweetmeat, professedly made from the root of the plant, but really composed of little else than colored sugar.

He borrowed from every one of the pupils—I don't know how he spent it except in hardbake and elecampane.

Thackeray, Newcomes, xiv.

elect (ē-lect'), v. t. [L. electus, pp. of eligere (> It. eleggere = Sp. eligir = P. elidir), pick out, choose, elect (= Gr. ἐκλεγειν, pick out, choose, > ult. E. elective); < i, out, + legere, pick out, pick, gather, collect, etc.: see legend. Cf. collect, select.] 1. To pick out; select from among a number; specifically, in theol., to select, especially as an object of divine mercy or favor. See election, 1.

The breath of worldly men cannot depose

The deputy elected by the Lord.

Shak, Rich. II., III. 2.

He lost nothing of . . . devotion to the sublime enterprise to which he held himself elected from his infancy by the promises of God.

Baneroff, Hist. U. S., I. 6.

If Oregon a work was elected to survive the ravages of time, it is a happy chance that it should be balanced by a group of performances of such a different temper.

H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 322.

Hence—2. To select for an office or employment by a majority or plurality (according to agreement) of votes; choose by ballot or any similar method; as, to elect a representative or a senator; to elect a president or mayor.

After the Death of Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury, the Monks of that Convent secretly in the Night elected one Reginald, their Sub-Prior, to succeed him.

Haker, Chronicles, p. 73.

3. To choose; prefer; determine in favor of.

Of his daughter by done, that were dere holdyn,

One Creusa was calld kynlyd by none,

That Creusa afterward Rit to wed,

That spokyn is of specially in our spede after.

Destruction of Troy (K. E. T. S.), I. 1491.

They have been, by the means that they elected, carried beyond the end that they designed.

election (ē-lek'shon), n. [< ME. election, election, < OF. election, F. election = Pr. electio = Sp. election = Pg. eleição = It. elezione, < L. electio(n-), a choosing, < eligere, pp. electus, pick out, choose, elect; see elect.] 1. A deliberate act of choice; particularly, a choice of means for accomplishing a given end.

Nor headlong carried by the stream of will,
Nor by his own election led to ill.

Daniel, Civil Wars, iv.

For what is Man without a moving mind,
Which hath a judging wit and choosing will?
Now if God's power should her election blind,
Her motions then would cease and stand all still.

Sir J. Davies, Nones Telpsum.

I had thought you
Had had more judgment to have made election
Of your companions.

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, I. 1.

The freedom of election—a freedom which is indispensable to all moral value, whether in doing or in suffering, in believing or denying.

De Quincy, Essences, I.

2. The choice of a person or persons for office of any kind by the voting of a body of qualified or authorized electors. The persons voted for are called candidates, or, with reference to their selection as candidates, nominees. Election for public office is now almost universally effected by the use of printed ballots. (See ballot.) The decision may depend upon the casting of an actual majority of all the votes for a candidate, as in various European countries and in some of the United States, or upon a plurality or the largest number of votes for any candidate where there are more than two opposing candidates, as in most of the United States. In the former case a new election has to be held when there is no actual majority; in the latter a single balloting is final unless there is a tie, which is very rare.

And always that make here Queen by Election, that is most worthy in Armes.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 156.

The election of a President of America, some years hence, will be much more interesting to certain nations of Europe than ever the election of a king of Poland was.

Jefferson, Correspondence, II. 275.

3. The act or process of choosing a person or persons for office by vote; a polling for office; also, the occasion or act time and provision for making such choice; as, a general or a special election; American elections are generally held in autumn.

Election, in a political sense, was formerly limited to "the act of choosing a person to fill an office or employment." The new sense . . . is a voting at the polls to ratify or reject a proposed measure.

Prof. F. P. Brower, in Trans. Amer. Philol. Ass., [XVII], App. p. vii.

Hence—4. By extension, a public vote upon a proposition submitted; a poll for the decision by vote of any public matter or question; as, to hold an election on a new constitution, or on a measure referred by the legislature to the people. [U. S.]—5†. Discernment; discrimination; distinction.

To use men with much difference and election is good.

Bacon.

6. In theol.: (a) The choice by God of particular individuals either (1) to be the recipients of his grace and of eternal life, or (2) to be commissioned for a particular work. Whether the choice in the former case is absolute or conditional is a disputed question in theology. Calvinism maintains that it is absolute; Arminianism, that it is conditional.

Knowing, brethren beloved, your election of God.

1 Thes. I. 4.

This election was not founded upon foreseen faith, and the obedience of faith, holiness, or any other good quality or disposition in man, as the prerequisite, cause, or condition on which it depended; but men are chosen to faith and to the obedience of faith, holiness, etc.

Calvinus of the Symbol of Dort, iv.

I believe election means, secondly, a divine appointment of some men to eternal happiness. But I believe this election to be conditional, as well as the reprobation opposite thereto.

John Wesley, Works, VI. 28.

(b†) Those who are elected by God to eternal life.

Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for; but the election hath obtained it.

Rom. xi. 7.

7. In astrol., a reason for choosing one time rather than another for an undertaking; a preference of times. See root, n.

The ascendant sofly, as well in alle matter as in question & election of times, is a thing which that these astrologians greatly observe.

Chaucer, Astrolabe, II. 41.

Elections hold good in those cases only where both the virtue of the heavenly bodies is such as does not quickly pass, and the action of the inferior bodies is such as is not suddenly accomplished.

Bacon, De Augmentis (tr. by Spedding), II. 4.

8. In math., a part or the whole of a number of distinguishable objects. The number of elections of n things is 2^n . 1. Thus, the elections of three things: A, B, C, are: A, B, C, AB, AC, BC, ABC.—Age of election. See age. 2. Dissent by election. See dissension.—Elections (Hours of Poll) Act, an English statute of 1884 (47 and 48 Vict. c. 34), which established hours for voting at parliamentary and municipal elections in certain boroughs, from 8 A. electioneer (ē-lek'shon-ēr'), v. i. [< election + -eer.] To employ means for influencing an election, as public speaking, solicitation of votes, etc.; work for the success of a candidate or of a party in an election; as, to electioneer for a candidate, or for a ticket; he electioneered with great effect.

He . . . took care to engage in his interest all those underlings who delight in galloping round the country to electioneer.

Miss Edgeworth, Rosanna, III.

The experiment is now making, . . . whether candidates for the presidency shall openly electioneer for that office.

R. Choute, Addresses, p. 425.

electioneerer (ē-lek'shon-ēr'), n. One who electioneers.

Many loud-tongued electioneers, who proved to Vivian, by everything but calculation, that he must be returned if he would but stand.

Miss Edgeworth, Vivian, II.

electioneering (ē-lek'shon-ēr-ing), p. a. Of or pertaining to the influencing of voters before or at an election; as, electioneering practices.

elective (ē-lek'tiv), a. and n. [= F. électif = Pr. electiu = Sp. Pg. electivo = It. elettivo, < L. as if "electus, < electus, pp. of eligere, pick out, choose; see elect.] 1. a. 1. Chosen by election; dependent on choice; bestowed or passing by election; as, an elective monarchy (one in which the king is raised to the throne by election); the office is elective: opposed to hereditary, or to tenure by appointment.

The elective mode of obtaining rulers is the characteristic policy of republican government.

A. Hamilton, The Federalist, No. IVII.

It came to be disputed whether the monarchy was hereditary or elective.

J. Adams, Works, IV. 302.

By its [the House of Lords] side arose the House of Commons, the elective house of the knights, citizens, and burgesses.

E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 360.

An elective magistracy and clergy, land for all who would till it, and reading and writing, will ye, mill ye.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 230.

2. Pertaining or relating to or consisting in the choice or right of choosing by vote; as, the elective principle in government; the elective franchise.

The pope . . . rejected both candidates, declared the elective power to be forfeited, and put in his own nominee.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 382.

The elective right of the chapters and the archiepiscopal confirmation were formally admitted.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 381.

3. Exerting the power of choice.

All moral goodness consisteth in the elective act of the understanding will.

N. Green, Cosmologia Sacra.

4. Selecting for combination; as, an elective attraction, which is a tendency in bodies to unite with certain kinds of matter in preference to other kinds.—Elective affinity. See chemical affinity, under chemical.—Elective franchise, monarchy, etc. See the nouns.

II. n. In the colleges of the United States, an optional study; any one of a number of studies from which the scholar is allowed to select that which he prefers.

Post graduate electives are allowed to a limited extent.

Jour. Pedagog., I. No. 6, advertising p. 6.

electively (ē-lek'tiv-ly), adv. By choice; with preference of one to another.

Cabbage is no food for her [the butterfly]; yet in the cabbage, not by chance, but studiously and electively, she lays her eggs.

Paley, Nat. Theol., xviii.

electivity (ē-lek'tiv-i-ti), n. [< elective + -ity.] The quality of being elective. F. W. H. Myers.

elector (ē-lek'tor), n. [= F. électeur = Sp. elector = Pg. elector = It. elettore, < L. elector, a chooser, < eligere, pp. electus, pick out, choose; see elect.] One who elects or has the right of choice; a person who has the legal right of voting for any functionary or the adoption of any measure; a voter. In free governments the people, or such of them as possess the prescribed qualifications, are the electors of their legislative representatives, and in some, as the United States, of their principal executive officers, and in some cases of their judicial officers.

The rule of Jefferson was followed in requiring no property qualification for an elector.

Bancroft, Hist. Const., II. 112.

Specifically—(a) In the Roman-German empire, one of the seven or more princes who had the right to elect the emperor. As established by the Golden Bull of 1356, these were the spiritual electors of Mayence, Treves, and Cologne, and the temporal electors of the Rhine Palatinate, Saxony, Brandenburg, and Bohemia. Other German princes, as the rulers of Bavaria, Hanover, etc., also had voices in the college of electoral princes for longer or shorter periods. The original electors held also the great magisterial offices of the imperial court. The whole system passed away with the empire in 1806. The temporal princes holding the right were generally known by the title of elector in their several dominions.

Munich is a place visited by most of the strangers who go into Germany; the elector's palace in the town was finely furnished.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. II. 214.

(b) In the United States, one of the presidential electors. See below.

The President of the United States . . . and the Vice-President are chosen for the term of four years, by electors, appointed in such manner as the several States may direct.

Calhoun, Works, I. 176.

The electors have no practical power over the election, and have had none since their institution.

T. H. Benton, Thirty Years, I. 37.

Presidential electors, persons elected by the voters of the several States for the purpose of electing the next President and Vice-President of the United States. Originally they were expected to exercise some independent choice among members of each party represented in their body; but in practice their function soon became merely that of casting votes predetermined by party nomination. Each State has as many electors as it has representatives and senators in Congress. No person holding an office under the United States government is eligible for an elector.—The Great Elector, the name usually given to Frederick William, Elector of Brandenburg from 1640 to 1688, who greatly strengthened the Brandenburg-Prussian power, and prepared the way for the elevation of the Prussian monarchy under Frederick the Great.

electoral (ē-lek'tor-al), a. [= F. électoral = Sp. electoral = Pg. electoral = It. elettorale; < elector + -al.] Of or pertaining to election or electors; consisting of electors.

Such are the subdivisions in favour of the electoral and other princes of the empire.

Burke, Economical Reform.

The restriction of the electoral franchise to the class which was qualified to serve on juries commended itself to moderate politicians of the fifteenth century.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 308.

Electoral college, a name informally given to the electors of a single State, when met to vote for President and Vice-President of the United States, and sometimes to the whole body of electors. See presidential electors, under elector.

In case the electoral college fails to choose a Vice-President, the power devolves on the Senate to make the selection from the two candidates having the highest number of votes.

Calhoun, Works, I. 175.

Electoral commission, in U. S. hist., an extraordinary commission, consisting of five senators, five representatives, and five associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, created by an act of Congress in 1877, to whom were to be referred all electoral votes for President and Vice-President as to the admission of which the two houses could not agree, the Republicans having a majority in the Senate and the Democrats in the House of Representatives. The occasion for the disagreement was the opposite views taken by the respective parties as to the relative validity of different sets of electoral votes returned from the lately seceded States of Louisiana, South Carolina, and Florida, and also from Oregon, which would decide the election. The result was the seating of the Republicans Hayes and Wheeler, as against the Democrats Tilden and Hendricks.—Electoral crown, the crown worn by the electors of the Roman-German empire, represented as arched with four half-circles supporting an orb and a cross, and doubled or faced with ermine, which turns up round the lower rim and has a scalloped edge, and with two fillets hanging down on the two sides.—Electoral mantle, a mantle worn as a mark of office by the electors of the Roman-German empire.

electorality (ē-lek'tor-al'i-ti), n. [< electoral + -ity.] An electorate.

Understanding as well this declaration to be for the electoralties, principalities, and estates, situate and being within the empire.

Reliquia Wottonianae, p. 504.

electorate (ē-lek'tor-āt), n. [= F. électoral = Sp. electoral = Pg. electoral = It. elettorato; as elector + -ate.] 1. The whole body of electors; the aggregate of citizens entitled to vote.

Our liberal electorate has the task thrown upon it not only of choosing a good minister, but also of determining what the good shall be which this minister is to bring us.

M. Arnold, in Nineteenth Century, XIX. 664.

In the new Parliament, notwithstanding the vast increase of the electorate, there was no direct representation of the unions.

The Century, XXVIII. 128.

2. The dignity of an elector in the Roman-German empire.—3. The territory of an elector in Germany.

He . . . cast himself command when he pleases, the whole strength of an electorate in the empire.

Adams, Freeholder.

electress, electress (ē-lek'tor-es, -tres), a. [= F. électrice = It. elettrici; as elector + -ess.] The wife or widow of an elector of the Roman-German empire.

The eyes of all the protestants in the nation turned towards the electress of Brandenburg; who was daughter to the queen of Bohemia. Ap. Sherwin, Hist. Own Times, an. 1700.

electrical (ē-lek'trī-āl), a. [elector + -al.] Same as electoral. [Here.]

I make no doubt they [the revolution society] would soon erect themselves into an electoral college, if things were ripe to give effect to their claim.

Burke, Rev. in Kranoe.

electorship (ē-lek'tor-ship), n. [elector + -ship.] The office of an elector.

And if the Bavarian hath male-issue of this young lady, the son is to succeed him in the electorship.

Howell, Letters, I. vi. 23.

Electra (ē-lek'trā), n. [L., < Gr. Ἠλέκτρα, a fem. proper name: see electricum.] 1. One of the Pleiades, 20 Tauri.—2. [NL.] In zool.: (a) A genus of polyps. Lamarck, 1816. (b) A genus of lepidopterous insects. Stephens, 1820. (c) A genus of dipterous insects. Loew, 1845. (d) A genus of mollusks.

electret, n. A middle English form of electricum. electropeter (ē-lek'trep'e-tēr), n. [Incorrectly formed, appar. meant for electrotopos, < Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + τροπέω, turn.] An instrument for changing the direction of electric currents.

electress, n. See electress.

electric (ē-lek'trik), a. and n. [= F. électrique = Sp. eléctrico = Pg. eléctrico = It. elettrico (cf. D. elektrisch = Dan. Sw. elektrisk), < NL. electricus, < L. electricum, amber (repr. electricity): see electricum. First used by Gilbert, "Vim illam electricum nobis placet appellare" (De Magnete (1600), ii. 2. p. 47).] 1. a. [Also electrical.] 1. Containing electricity, or capable of exhibiting it when excited by friction: as, an electric body, such as amber or glass. Boyle, Atmospheres of Consistent Bodies (1667).—2. Pertaining to or consisting in electricity: as, electric power; an electric discharge.—3. Derived from or produced by electricity: as, an electric shock; an electric light.—4. Conveying electricity; producing electricity; communicating a shock by electricity: as, an electric machine; electric wires; the electric coil or fish.

Certain fishes belonging to the genera Torpedo (among the Elasmobranchii), Gymnotus, Malapterurus, and Mormyrus (among the Telostei), possess organs which convert nervous energy into electricity, just as muscles convert the same energy into ordinary motion. . . . The nerves of the electrical organs proceed from the fifth pair, and from the electric lobe of the medulla oblongata, which appears to be developed at the origin of the pneumogastries.

Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 64.

5. Operated by electricity: as, an electric bell; an electric railway.—6. Figuratively, full of fire, spirit, or passion, and capable of communicating it to others: magnetic.

Dynamo-electric machine. See electric machine, below.—Electric absorption. See residual charge, under residual.—Electric action, in organ-building, a mechanism in which the connection between the keyboard and the pipes is made by the help of electricity.—Electric alarm, any alarm or signaling device controlled or operated by a current of electricity. The alarm is sounded by the closing of the electric circuit which may be effected by a thermostat, a door, a sash, or other device, according to the purpose for which the alarm is used. See alarm, thermostat, and fire-alarm.—Electric annunciator, an apparatus by means of which the location of the point at which an electric circuit is made or broken is indicated. A number of electromagnets are connected, each with some particular station, room, or point from which a signal may come; the opening or closing of the circuit at any of these points operates the electromagnet to which it is joined, bringing into view a number, letter, or word indicating the location of the point. An alarm bell is generally rung at the same time.—Electric apparatus, the various machines and appliances necessary for conducting electrical experiments, and illustrating the laws of electric action.—Electric atmosphere, electric aura. See aura.—Electric bridge, call-bell, clock, current, displacement, cell, egg, fuse, governor, hammer, harpoon, etc. See the nouns.—Electric field, any space in which electric force exists.—Electric force, the force existing among bodies charged with electricity, due to the existence of the charge.—Electric lamp, the contrivance in which the electric light is produced. Electric light, light produced by electricity; especially, a brilliant light for purposes of illumination obtained by means of a powerful current of electricity, generated by a magneto- or dynamo-electric machine. The light is of two general kinds, the arc-light and the incandescent light. In the first the voltaic arc is employed; in the second a rotating conductor is rendered incandescent by the current. The arc-light (see voltaic arc, under arc) is produced when a powerful current passes between two carbon electrodes, at first in contact and afterward separated a short distance, the result being the formation of the voltaic arc. The light of the arc and the glowing carbon-points has great intensity, and electric lamps of this kind are extensively used for purposes of illumination, where a powerful light (1,200 candle-power or upward) can be economically employed. In order to keep the carbon electrodes at a constant distance, so that the light may be uniform, some form of regulator is generally needed. Commonly an electromagnet, through which the current passes, is used for this purpose. As the carbons are slowly consumed the distance between them increases; the current meets with greater resistance, and is weakened accordingly; this in turn weakens the electromagnet, which acts less powerfully on its armature, and thus through some mechanical device causes the points to approach each other. If they come too near together, the strengthened current strengthens the electromagnet, and the same contrivance pulls them apart again; so that the current automatically regulates itself. In electric candles this necessity is done away with; here, as in the Jablochhoff candle, for example, the carbon pencils are placed side by side, separated by some insulating earthy substance, the arc is formed at the top, and the candle burns away in a manner analogous to that of an ordinary candle. With these candles alternating currents are employed to obviate the difficulty that would otherwise arise from the more rapid consumption of the carbon forming the positive pole. In an incandescent electric lamp, or glow lamp, the current is made to pass through a strip of some substance which, because of its high resistance, becomes highly heated, and hence brilliantly incandescent. Practically, the only suitable substance known is carbon, which in the form of a thin strip or wire, carefully prepared for the purpose (for example, from a strip of bamboo) and bent in a loop, is inclosed in a bulb of glass from which the air has been exhausted. The vacuum is essential to prevent the consumption of the carbon at the high temperature to which it is raised. The incandescent light is comparable in brilliancy to a good gas burner, and is hence suitable for general house illumination. It is superior to gas in steadiness, and has the great advantage that it does not vitiate the air. The current employed has, for lamps of ordinary power, much less strength than that needed for the arc light. The clutch lamp is an arc lamp in which the rod to which the upper carbon is attached is surrounded by an annular clutch, which is raised when the circuit is completed, thus establishing the arc. Electric log, a ship's log in which the recording mechanism may be stopped by closing an electrical circuit through the log line when it is necessary to haul the log on board ship. Another form of electric log uses the recording mechanism to close a circuit through the log line, and report the record of the log on the vessel. See log.—Electric machine, a machine for generating large quantities of electricity. Those commonly used for producing static electricity depend upon either friction or induction for their operation. For producing current electricity a magneto-electric or dynamo-electric machine is employed. The frictional electric machine usually consists of a plate or cylinder of glass, which is made by means of a handle to revolve between stationary cushions whose surfaces are covered with amalgam. One form of electricity (positive) is generated on the revolving plate, and is taken off by comb to a large brass cylinder called the prime conductor, the other (negative) is generated on the cushions, and may also be collected on a conductor but is generally allowed to pass off to the earth through a metallic chain. The electricity obtained is the equivalent of the mechanical energy expended in turning the crank, less that which through friction is expended in producing useless heat. An induction-machine acts upon the principle of induction. Thus, in the Holtz machine no friction is used except to charge the armatures. It consists of a stationary glass plate with two open spaces, or "windows," on opposite sides of the center, and of a second glass plate which is revolved very rapidly in front of it. On the other side of the movable plate, and opposite the windows, are two combs connecting with brass conductors ending in large knobs. On one side of each window is attached a piece of paper, called the armature, and a tongue of paper projects from it into the open space toward the revolving wheel. In the use of the Holtz machine and others of the same kind a small initial charge must first be communicated to the armature. By induction this is increased until a maximum, depending on the insulating power of the machine and its supports, is reached. The electrical energy developed has its equivalent in the work done in overcoming alternate attraction and repulsion of the moving and fixed parts. The effects of an induction machine are much more powerful than those of the plate machine, and it is less influenced by dampness in the air. It is consequently a very useful machine in the physical laboratory, being much used for static experiments. When a powerful current of electricity is required, a magneto-electric or dynamo-electric machine driven by a steam- or gas-engine, or by water-power, is employed. These machines depend upon the induction which takes place between magnets and coils of wire, when their relative positions are changed. (See induction.) The distinction between the magneto- and dynamo-machines is that in the former a permanent magnet is employed, while in the latter its place is taken by an electromagnet. A simple form of the first consists of a large horseshoe magnet, before the poles of which two bobbins wound with insulated copper wire and inclosing cores of soft iron are made to revolve; the variation in magnetic intensity and polarity as these soft iron cores alternately approach and recede from the poles of the permanent magnet produces induced currents in the wire of the bobbins. These currents are reversed for each half-revolution, and hence a machine of this type produces an alternating current. By the use of a commutator, however, the current may be rectified, so that it passes through the connecting wire always in the same direction. In another form of the machine the soft iron core is in the form of a ring, about which a number of separated coils of insulated wire are wound, the ends of which are taken to the central axis. This circular armature revolves between the poles of the horseshoe magnet, and the result is the generation of a current in one direction in one half of the coils, and in the opposite direction in the other half. The current is taken off for the outside circuit by means of two metallic brushes on each side of the central axis. The magneto-electric machine has been displaced for practical use by the dynamo-

Frictional electric machine

Brush multi-current dynamo

electric machine, or dynamo. The dynamo-machines in use are of many forms, but all consist essentially of one or more large electromagnets (called the field-magnets) between the poles of which an armature, consisting of a soft iron core wound with coils of insulated copper wire, is made to revolve very rapidly by means of an engine. In most of them the principle of reduplication is involved. That is, commencing with a very small amount of residual magnetism in the field magnets, the inductive action between them and the revolving armature results in the production of a feeble current in the coils. This current may be made to pass through the wire of the stationary magnets, strengthening them so that they exert a stronger inductive influence on the armature, thus producing a strong current in the coils, which again charges more strongly the field-magnets and so on until the machine is in full action. The charging of the field magnets is accomplished in different ways. In some forms of the machine the field-magnets are excited by independent currents, produced by a separate machine, in other forms (called series dynamo) the current generated in the armature charges the field-magnets, and is also used for the outside work, the coils of the electromagnets, in other words, forming part of the external circuit. In still other forms (called shunt dynamo) a portion only of the current generated in the armature is used to charge the field magnets, the remainder being taken off for the practical outside work. Many different forms of the machine are now in use, and they have proved an economical and convenient means of obtaining powerful currents of electricity, when it is to be used for producing the electric light, for electroplating, for the transmission of power or energy, and so on. In the transmission of energy by electricity, the current produced by the machine is made to pass through a second machine (called an electric motor), generally similar to and often identical with the dynamo in form and construction, the order of working being reversed, distant a number of miles, perhaps, from the first and there it can be employed to do any kind of mechanical work. Dynamoes have a high degree of efficiency, many transforming over 90 per cent. of the mechanical energy used in revolving the armature into the energy of the electric current. They furnish the electric current much more economically as well as more regularly, than a voltaic battery, since the zinc, the fuel of the latter, is an expensive and a poor fuel, as compared with the coal used for the engine which drives the dynamo. Electric meter, an instrument designed to measure the quantity of electricity supplied to consumers for the production of light or heat, or to be used as a motive power. Electric motor. See electric machine. Electric organ. See organ. Electric pendulum, a form of electrostatic consisting of a pith-ball suspended by a non-conducting thread. Electric piano. See piano. Electric railway, a railway on which electricity is the motive power. The wheels of each car may be set in motion by an electric motor to which they are geared, or a motor car may draw one or more cars. There are two distinct systems of electric railway. In one the electric motor is actuated by a current of electricity drawn from a secondary or "storage" battery carried with the car, generally underneath the floor; in the other the current is conveyed from a dynamo at some point on the line by means of conductors, which may be supported upon poles or placed in an underground conduit. Electric storm, a violent disturbance of the electrical condition of the earth, resulting in strong earth-currents through long lines of telegraph, often interfering with the ordinary working of the line. These storms are sometimes widespread, and are thought by some physicists to be related to quaternary disturbances of the atmosphere of the sun. The phrase is also applied to unusually violent displays of atmospheric electricity. Electric telegraph cable. See cable. Electric tension, difference of electric potential; often used as equivalent to electromotive force. (See also battery, cell, current, condenser, electricity, fluid, potential, telegram, telephone, tenacity, spark, unit.)

II. n. A body or substance capable of exhibiting electricity by means of friction or otherwise, and of resisting the passage of it from one body to another. See electricity. To excite an electric. See excite.

electrical (ē-lek'tri-kəl), a. [electric + al.] Same as electric.

We believe that the time has arrived when the scientific world no longer looks upon electrical phenomena as isolated and separate from the phenomena of heat and light, or chemical reactions. Science, IV, 104

Electrical burglar-alarm, endosmosis, etc. See the nouns. Electrical diaphan, an instrument consisting of a tuning-fork or reed, the vibration of which is maintained by means of electricity. Electrical engineering, the science and art of utilizing electricity, especially in the production of light, heat, and motive power. In the transmission and distribution of energy, and in its application to a great variety of metallurgical and other processes. It also includes the science and art of the erection and maintenance of telegraphic and cable lines, of electric railway systems, and other forms of electric signaling. Electrical mortar, a small mortar within which a discharge is made to take place between two bodies charged with contrary electricities. This disruptive discharge causes so violent a disturbance of the air particles as to expel a light ball placed in the mouth of the mortar. See Volta's pistol, under pistol.

electrically (ē-lek'tri-kəl), adv. In the manner of electricity, or by means of it; as regards electricity.

electricalness (ē-lek'tri-kəl-ness), n. The state or quality of being electrical. [Rare.]

electrician (ē-lek'tri-shi-ən), n. [= F. electricien, as electric + -ian.] 1. One who studies electricity, and investigates its properties by observation and experiments; one versed in the science of electricity. — 2. One engaged in the business of making or supplying electric apparatus or appliances.

electricity (ē-lek'tris-i-ti), n. [= D. elektricität = G. elektricität = Dan. Sw. elektricitet = F. électricité = Sp. electricidad = Pg. electricidade = It. elettricità, < NL. electricitas, < electricus, electric; see electric.] In physics, a name denoting the cause of an important class of phenomena of attraction and repulsion, chemical decomposition, etc., or, collectively, these phenomena themselves. The true nature of electricity is as yet not well understood; but it is probable that it is not, as was formerly assumed, of the nature of a fluid—either a single fluid, as was supposed by Franklin, or two fluids (positive and negative) as was supposed by Symmer. The word was first used by Gilbert, the creator of the science of electricity, and by him was applied to the phenomena of attraction and repulsion as exhibited when amber (electron) and some other substances of a similar character were briskly rubbed. Its meaning has been gradually extended to include a large variety of phenomena, among which may be named heating, luminous and magnetic effects, chemical decomposition, etc., together with numerous apparent attractions and repulsions of matter widely differing from those originally noted, but all of which are attributed to a common cause. The subject is usually divided into the two parts of static or frictional electricity, including the electricity produced by friction and analogous means, the phenomena of which are chiefly static, and current electricity (also called voltic electricity), including that produced by the chemical or voltaic battery and electromagnetism, in which the phenomena of which are mostly dynamical. The term of electricity first discovered was the frictional. The discovery is generally attributed to Thales (sixth century B. C.), who observed that amber, after being rubbed by silk, had the property of attracting light bodies, like bits of paper, bran, etc. It was subsequently discovered that glass, sulphur, resin, and many other bodies gained by friction this same property to a greater or less extent. When electricity is produced by the friction of silk on glass, that of the glass is called out-ous or positive electricity, while that of the silk rubber is called re-ous or negative electricity. When produced by the friction of flannel or silk on sealing wax, that of the wax is negative, and that of the flannel or silk rubber is positive. This distinction, which, however, is properly explained as due to a difference of electrical potential (see potential), extends through the whole subject, by whatever means the electricity is produced. It is found universally true that the two kinds of electricity are produced in equal amounts. Besides friction, there are other means of exciting electricity, as pressure between two bodies or sudden fracture (by which sucrose sugar becomes faintly luminous when broken in the dark). If a piece of sealing wax is broken, the opposite ends will be found to be dissimilarly electrified. This is especially true of the fracture of cleavable minerals, like mica, calcite, etc. Some crystallized bodies become electrified by change of temperature; for example, a crystal of tourmaline, on being slightly warmed, becomes positively electrified at one extremity, and negatively at the other. If cooled, the poles are reversed. (See pyro-electricity.) For the chief means of obtaining a supply of frictional electricity, see electric machine, under electric, and electrophorus. The principal subjects considered under the head of static electricity are the distribution of electricity over the surface of a conductor, as determined by its shape or the proximity of other electrified bodies (see induction); the effect of induction on the production of an electrified state in a neutral body by approaching it to one already electrified, but without contact; the degree of induction, as determined by the nature of the non-conductor or dielectric (see induction, condenser, dielectric); the accumulation of electricity in a condenser, as a Leyden jar (see condenser, and Leyden jar, under jar); the measurement of capacity, potential, quantity, etc. (as with an electrometer), and the phenomena of discharge, as the spark-discharge, which takes place between oppositely electrified bodies when they are brought near together, the brush discharge, etc. The electricity generated by friction and analogous means is in a state of high potential (see potential), but the quantity, and therefore the amount of electrical energy, is generally small, it has the power of overcoming great resistance and producing violent mechanical effects as seen in the discharge of a Holtz machine, and still more strikingly in the case of lightning. Frictional electricity has found but few useful applications in the arts. The common means of producing current electricity is the voltaic battery. (See battery and cell.) Electrical currents may also be obtained by revolving a coil of wire in the space (magnetic field) between the poles of a steel magnet or electromagnet, so as to cut the lines of force between those poles. This principle is made use of in magneto-electric and dynamo-electric machines (see electric) to obtain powerful currents of electricity for practical use. A current may also be produced by soldering together two ends of two bars of different metals, connecting the other ends with a copper wire, and then heating (or cooling) the first point of union. This is called the thermo-electric, and the pair of metals is called a thermo-electric couple; it is analogous to the voltaic couple, only in the electrical current is obtained at the expense of the heat supplied. (See thermo-electricity.) The principal subjects considered under the head of current electricity are the effects of the current in causing chemical decomposition (see electrolysis, electrometallurgy), in producing heat and light through the resistance of the medium, including the voltaic arc, and in the production of induced currents in a coil of wire, under certain conditions, by the action of another current or a magnet (see induction); the measurement of strength of current (as with a galvanometer or ampere-meter, which see) of electromotive force (as with a volt meter) and of resistance (as with the electric bridge or ohm meter), etc. The current electricity produced by the chemical battery or ordinary dynamo machine differs from the static electricity of the frictional or induction machine, in that the difference of potentials of the poles, or, in other words, the electromotive force of the current when the poles are connected, is relatively small, while the quantity of electricity is relatively enormously large. Correspondingly, ordinary current electricity has relatively very little power of overcoming a high resistance; no spark is obtained, even from a powerful battery, when the poles are separated by so much as a small fraction of an inch, but the current can do a large amount of work in producing chemical decomposition (as in the electrolysis of water), or mechanically, when transformed by an electric motor. Induced currents, however, as those produced by an induction-coil (which see), may have a very high electromotive force and consequent power of overcoming resistance. Animal electricity. See animal. Contact theory of electricity, a theory which assumes that the electromotive force of a voltaic cell, and perhaps the electricity produced by friction, is due to the difference of potential assumed by two dissimilar substances when placed in contact. — Diffusion of electricity. See diffusion. — Distribution of electricity. See distribution. — Electrostatic units of electricity. See electrostatic. — Excitation of electricity. See excitation. — Free and bound electricity. By a "free" charge of electricity is generally meant one which is borne by an insulated body independently of surrounding objects, while a "bound" charge is one held in position by the presence and attraction of a charge of the opposite character or sign upon a neighboring body. As a matter of fact all charges are "bound," the production of a given quantity of one kind of electricity being always accompanied by the production of the same quantity of the opposite kind. When this complementary charge is very distant and widely distributed, as on the walls of a room, the first may be said to be "free" electricity.

electricute (ē-lek'tri-kū), v. t. [Contracted from electric + execute.] To put to death judicially by means of electricity. Also electrocute. [Recent and colloq.]

electricution (ē-lek'tri-kū'shon), n. The act of electricuting. [Recent and colloq.]

electriferous (ē-lek'trif'e-rus), a. [LL. electrifer, producing amber (bearing electricity) (< L. electrum, amber (repr. electricity), + ferre = F. bear), + -ous.] Bearing or transmitting electricity. Also electrophorous.

electrifiable (ē-lek'tri-fi-ā-bil), a. [electrify + -able.] 1. Capable of receiving electricity, or of being charged with it; that may be electrified or become electric. — 2. Capable of receiving and transmitting the electric fluid.

electrification (ē-lek'tri-fī-kā'shon), n. [electrify + -ation.] The act of electrifying, or the state of being charged with electricity. This may be positive (+) or negative (−), according as the body is charged with positive or negative electricity—that is, according as its potential is higher or lower than the assumed zero. See potential.

electrifier (ē-lek'tri-fī-ēr), n. One who or that which electrifies.

electrify (ē-lek'tri-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. electrified, ppr. electrifying. [L. electrum, amber (repr. electricity), + ficare, make; see -fy.] 1. To communicate electricity to; charge with electricity; make electric; as, to electrify a jar. — 2. To cause electricity to pass through; affect by electricity; give an electric shock to; as, to electrify a limb. — 3. To excite suddenly; give a sudden shock to; surprise with some sudden and startling effect, of a brilliant or shocking nature; startle greatly; thrill; as, the whole assembly was electrified.

He [Milton] electrifies the mind. Macaulay, Milton.

If the sovereign were now to innumerate a subject in defiance of the writ of Habeas Corpus, or to put a conspirator to the torture, the whole nation would be instantly electrified by the news. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., I.

electrine (ē-lek'trin), n. [LL. electrinus, < Gr. ἤλεκτρον, made of amber or electrum, < ἤλεκτρον, amber, electrum; see electrum.] 1. Belonging to or made of amber. — 2. Composed of the alloy called electrum (which see).

electrine (ē-lek'trin), n. [electrum (electric) + -ine.] The (supposed) principle of electricity; a (supposed) kind of matter which manifests electrical phenomena.

A hitherto undescribed ponderable chemical element, which he terms electrine, and which he assumes to be an essential constituent of oxygen.

Ashmole, in Reichenbach's Dynamics, Pref., p. xiv.

electrization (ē-lek'tri-zā'shon), n. [= F. électrization = Sp. electrización = Pg. electricação; as electrize + -ation.] The act of electrifying. Also spelled electrisation.

It is not electricity which cures, but Electrizations, a process requiring far more technical skill than the uninitiated generally believe. Allen, and Nevins, VI, 153.

electrize (ē-lek'triz), v. t.; pret. and pp. electrized, ppr. electrizing. [= D. elektriseren = G. elektrisieren = Dan. elektrisere = Sw. elektrisera = F. électriser = Sp. Pg. electrizar = It. elettrizzare, < NL. elektrizare, electrify, < L. electrum, amber (repr. electricity).] To make electric; electrify. Also spelled electrise.

electrizer (ē-lek'tri-zēr), n. One who or that which electrifies; specifically, an apparatus for the application of electricity for medical purposes. Also spelled electriser.

electro (ē-lek'trō), n. [Abbreviation of electrotype.] An electrotpe.

For these reasons the Act is objectionable in prohibiting the importation of stereos and electros. Amer. Publishers' Circular.

electro- [NL., etc., electro-, formally repr. Gr. ἤλεκτρον, combining form of electron, amber, electrum (see electrum), but practically a contraction of electro-, combining form of electricus, E. electric; see electric.] The combining form, in many modern compounds, of electric, often representing also electricity. [In the following compounds containing electro-, where the second element exists independently in English, or is otherwise perfectly obvious, and where no partial forms are cited, no etymology is given.]

electroballistic (ē-lek'trō-ba-lis'tik), a. Concerned with electricity as used to determine the velocity of a projectile at any part of its flight; an epithet applied to various instruments invented by Navez. The projectile passes in succession through two or more screens, the distances between which are known; and, the exact time of passage through each screen being electrically recorded, a simple calculation gives the velocity at that part of the flight.

electrobath (ē-lek'trō-bath), n. The liquid used in electroplating, in which the metal to be deposited is held in solution.

electrobiological (ē-lek'trō-bi-olōj'i-kal), a. Of or pertaining to electrobiology.

electrobiologist (ē-lek'trō-bi-olōj'i-jist), n. One versed in electrobiology.

electrobiology (ē-lek'trō-bi-olōj'i-jī), n. 1. Biology as concerned with electrical phenomena; that branch of science which treats of the electric currents developed in living organisms.— 2. That phase of mesmerism or animal magnetism in which the actions, feelings, etc., of a person in the mesmeric condition are controlled, or supposed to be controlled, by the will of the operator.

electrobioscopy (ē-lek'trō-bi-olōj'i-kō-pi), n. The process of testing the muscles with electricity to determine if life is extinct. Greer, Dict. of Electricity, p. 49.

electrobronze (ē-lek'trō-bronz), n. A metallic coat given to iron articles by an electro-bath. The coating is subsequently protected by a varnish.

electrocapillarity (ē-lek'trō-kap-i-lar'i-ti), n. Certain phenomena collectively occurring at the common surface of two liquids in contact when their difference of potential is altered. The surface-tension of the liquids is changed, and motion usually results. See electrocapillary.

electrocapillary (ē-lek'trō-kap'i-lā-ri), a. Capillary and electrical; designating certain capillary phenomena produced by electricity. For example, if a horizontal glass tube be filled with a dilute acid, and a drop of mercury be placed in the middle of the tube, the passage of a current of electricity through it will cause the drop to move toward the negative pole. A capillary electrometer has been constructed, in which the pressure of a column of liquid is made to balance the electrocapillary force exerted at the surface of contact of mercury and dilute acid, this force being nearly proportional to the electromotive force when it does not exceed one volt.

electrocantury (ē-lek'trō-kā'tēr-i), n. In surg., cauterizing by means of a platinum wire heated by the passage of a current of electricity; the instrument used.

electrochemical (ē-lek'trō-kem'i-kal), a. Pertaining to electrochemistry.

The electromotive force of an electrolyte is equal to the mechanical equivalent of the heat of combination of its electrochemical equivalent.

Atkinson, Tr. of Mascart and Joubert, 1: 247.

Electrochemical series, the arrangement of the chemical elements in such an order that all the elements which are electropositive with reference to a given element are placed before it, and all those which are electronegative after it. See electrolysis.

electrochemically (ē-lek'trō-kem'i-kal-i), adv. According to the laws of electrochemistry.

electrochemist (ē-lek'trō-kem'i-jist), n. One who practises electrochemistry.

It [electrometallurgy] is a subject of intense interest to the chemist and to the electrician, for it combines principles underlying its practice, which belong to both professions. In fact the man skilled in its science and art may appropriately be styled an electrochemist. Jour. Franklin Inst., CXXXI, 81.

electrochemistry (ē-lek'trō-kem'i-ist-ri), n. Chemistry as concerned with electricity; the science which treats of the agency of electricity in effecting chemical changes. It is generally divided into electrolysis, or the separation of a compound body into its constituent parts by the passage of an electric current, and electrometallurgy, or the application of electrolysis to the arts. See electrolysis.

electrochronograph (ē-lek'trō-kron-ō-grāf), n. A chronograph on which the record is made by electrical means; much used in astronomical observatories and in the laboratory for noting the precise instant or duration of transits and similar phenomena. See chronograph.

electrochronographic (ē-lek'trō-kron-ō-grāf'ik), a. Pertaining to an electrochronograph, or indicated and recorded by means of it.

electrocopper (ē-lek'trō-kop'ēr), r. t. To plate or cover with copper by means of electricity. See electroplating.

Steel, iron, zinc, lead, and tin which have been previously electrocoppered. Workshop Receipts, 1st ser., p. 212.

electrocute, electrocution. See electricute, electricution.

electrode (ē-lek'trōd), n. [= F. electrode; as electric + Gr. dōs, way.] A pole of the current from an electric battery or machine which is in use in effecting electrolysis; applied generally to the two ends of an open electric circuit. The positive pole is termed the anode, and the negative pole the cathode.

electrodeposit (ē-lek'trō-dē-poz'it), n. That which has been deposited by means of electricity.

electrodeposit (ē-lek'trō-dē-poz'it), r. t. To deposit, as a metal or other substance, from a chemical compound, by means of electricity.

In the same year also M. de Ruolz electrodeposited brass from a solution composed of the cyanides of copper and zinc dissolved in aqueous cyanides of potassium. Q. Jour. Electro-Metallurgy, p. 25.

electrodeposition (ē-lek'trō-dē-pō-zish'on), n. The deposition of metals or other substances from a solvent by means of electricity.

Employed electrodeposition for producing the copper plates. Q. Jour. Electro-Metallurgy, p. 25.

electrodepositor (ē-lek'trō-dē-pōz'it-tor), n. One who practises the art of electrodeposition.

In 1840, M. de Ruolz, a French electrodepositor, had taken out a patent in France for electroplating. W. H. Wahl, Galvanoplastic Manipulations, p. 5.

electrodiapason (ē-lek'trō-di-a-pā'zon), n. Same as electrical diapason (which see, under electrical).

A universal support or electro diapason, intended to inscribe and show in projection the vibratory movements. Jour. Franklin Inst., CXXXI, Suppl., p. 48.

electrodynamical, electrodynamic (ē-lek'trō-di-nam'ik, -i-kal), a. Pertaining to electrodynamics. Directrix of electrodynamic action. See directrix.

electrodynamics (ē-lek'trō-di-nam'iks), n. That part of the science of electricity which treats of the mutual action of electric currents and of currents and magnets.

electrodynamism (ē-lek'trō-di-na-mizm), n. See the extract.

The trance caused by regarding fixedly a gleaming point produces in the brain, in his [Dr. Philipson's] opinion, an accumulation of a peculiar nervous power, which he calls electrodynamism. Science, IX, 342.

electrodynamometer (ē-lek'trō-di-na-mōm'e-ter), n. [electrodynamie + L. metrum, a measure.] An instrument for measuring the strength of an electric current by means of the attraction or repulsion mutually exerted by two coils of wire, through at least one of which the whole or a part of the current to be measured passes.

Weber devised an instrument known as an electrodynamometer for measuring the strength of currents by means of the electrodynamic action of one part of the circuit upon another part. N. P. Thompson, Elect. and Mag., p. 26.

electrodynamometrical (ē-lek'trō-di-na-mōm'e-tri-kal), a. Pertaining to the electrodynamicometer.

Electrodynamometrical measurements. Electrical Rev., XLII, 139.

electro-engraving (ē-lek'trō-en-grāv'ing), n. An etching process in which the plate, covered with a ground and properly etched, is placed in an electrobath to deepen the "bite" or cutting-in of the lines.

electro-ergometer (ē-lek'trō-er-gom'e-ter), n. See ergometer.

electrogenesis (ē-lek'trō-jen'e-sis), n. Causation or production by electricity.

electrogenetic (ē-lek'trō-jen-et'ik), a. Of or pertaining to electrogenesis.

electroglid (ē-lek'trō-gil'd), r. t. pret. and pp. electroglided, electroglit, ppr. electrogliding. To glid, by means of the voltaic battery, with a thin deposit of gold precipitated from a bath of a salt of the metal.

electroglider (ē-lek'trō-gil'd'ēr), n. One who practises electrogliding.

electrograph (ē-lek'trō-grāf), n. [Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity, see electric, electro), + γραφω, write.] 1. A curve automatically traced and forming a continuous record of the indications of an electrometer.— 2. An apparatus for engraving the copper cylinders used in printing fabrics and wall papers. The cylinder is first coated with varnish, which is scratched by diamond points traveling upon it, and controlled by electric breakers, that are in turn controlled by the copyist. The exposed portions are then etched by exposure to an acid bath.

electrography (ē-lek'trō-grāf'i), n. [Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + γραφω, write.] 1. Galvanography. Specifically.— 2. The process of copying a fine engraving on copper or steel by means of an electro-copper deposit.

electrokinetic (ē-lek'trō-kī-net'ik), a. Of or pertaining to electrokinetics, or electricity in motion.

electrokinetics (ē-lek'trō-kī-net'iks), n. That branch of electricity which treats of electric currents, or the flow of electricity.

electrolizer (ē-lek'trō-lēr), n. [Modern, formed in imitation of chanclier.] A bracket, pen-dant, or stand, often with branches, and ornamented, used for supporting incandescent electric lamps.

electrolithotripsy (ē-lek'trō-li-thot'ri-ti), n. Lithotripsy, or the destruction of vesical calculi, effected by electrolysis.

electrologic, electrological (ē-lek'trō-lōj'ik, -i-kal), a. [electrology + -ic, -ical.] Of or pertaining to electrology.

electrologist (ē-lek'trō-lōj'i-jist), n. One versed in the science of electrology.

electrology (ē-lek'trō-lōj'i-jī), n. [= F. électrologie; Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + λογία, λόγος, speak; see -ology.] The department of physical science which treats of the phenomena and properties of electricity.

electrolyzability, electrolyzable, etc. See electrolyzability, etc.

electrolysis (ē-lek'trō-lī-sis), n. [= F. électrolyse, Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + λύσις, solution, resolution, λύω, λύω, solve, resolve. (Cf. analysis.)] The decomposition of a chemical compound, called the electrolyte, into its constituent parts by an electric current. Thus, water is decomposed by electrolysis into hydrogen and oxygen; of these it is found that the hydrogen is attracted by the negative pole (the cathode), and is hence said to be electropositive, and is called the cation; while the oxygen collects at the positive pole (the anode), and is said to be electronegative, and is called the anion. Similarly, by experimenting with different compounds and observing the behavior in each case, an electrochemical series of the elements, arranged in order, from oxygen, the most negative, to the most positive metals, sodium, potassium, etc., has been deduced. A salt may also be decomposed by electrolysis; thus, copper sulphate yields metallic copper at the negative pole (upon which it is deposited), and sulphuric acid at the positive pole. By electrolysis Davy was able to decompose lime and the other alkaline earths, and thus to show that they were compounds of metals, calcium, etc., with oxygen. An electrolysis in which the ions (a term including both anion and cation) are produced at their respective electrodes without interference from these electrodes or the surrounding electrolyte is called a primary electrolysis. Very often combinations take place between the ions and the electrodes by the electrolyte, so that the final products are different from the true ions. This is called secondary electrolysis. For the application of electrolysis to the arts, see electrometallurgy.

electrolyte (ē-lek'trō-līt), n. [Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + λύσις, verbal n. of λύω, solve, dissolve. (Cf. electrolysis.)] A compound which is decomposable, or is subjected to decomposition, by an electric current.

No elementary substance can be an electrolyte: for from the nature of the operation compounds alone are susceptible of electrolysis. W. A. Miller, Elem. of Chem., 1: 282.

electrolytic, electrolytical (ē-lek'trō-līt'ik, -i-kal), a. [= F. électrolytique; as electrolyte + -ic, -ical.] Pertaining to or of the nature of electrolysis.

It is not improbable that the increased electrolytic power of water by the addition of some acids, such as the sulphuric and phosphoric, where the acids themselves are not decomposed, depends upon a catalytic effect of these acids. W. H. Green, Cat. of Forces, p. 166.

Electrolytic cell. See cell.
electrolytically (ē-lek'trō-līt'ik-al-i), adv. In an electrolytic manner; by means of electrolysis; as in electrolysis.

The fibre is carbonized in mouth of nickel, and is attached to the conducting wires by copper, electrolytically deposited upon them. G. B. Prescott, Dynam. Elect., p. 223.

electrolyzability (ē-lek'trō-lī-zā-bil'i-ti), n. The capability of being decomposed by an electric current. Also spelled electrolyzability.

electrolyzable (ē-lek'trō-lī-zā-bil), a. [= F. électrolyzable; as electrolyte + -able.] Susceptible of decomposition by an electric current. Also spelled electrolyzable.

electrolyzation (ē-lek'trō-lī-zā-sh'n), n. [= F. électrolysat, as electrolyte + -ation.] The act of electrolyzing. Also spelled electrolyzation.

electrolyze (ē-lek'trō-lī-z), r. t.; pret. and pp. electrolyzed, ppr. electrolyzing. [= F. électrolyser, electrolysis, Cf. analyse, C. analysis.] To decompose by the direct action of electricity. Also spelled electrolyse.

electromagnet (ē-lek'trō-mag'net), n. A magnet which owes its magnetic properties to the inductive action of an electric current. If an insulated wire is wound about a bar of soft iron and a current of electricity is passed through it, the bar becomes a temporary magnet with a north and a south pole; the end at which the current circulates through the wire in the direction of the hands of a clock, as the observer looks at it, is the south pole. In practice, an electromagnet has ordinarily a horseshoe form. It consists of two cylinders, or cores, of soft iron, fastened together at one end and each wound many times with insulated wire; the wire must be so wound that if the horseshoe were straightened the direction of winding would be the same throughout. An electromagnet may be made very powerful, so as to support a ton or more. The soft iron core retains its maximum magnetization only so long as the current is passing, and loses nearly all of it the instant the current ceases. This principle is made use of in the telegraph (which see), electric clocks, electric call-bells, etc. If the core is made of steel, it becomes under the action of the current a permanent magnet.

electromagnetic (ē-lek' trō-mag-net'ik), a. Pertaining to electromagnetism, or to the relation between electricity and magnetism; of the nature of electromagnetism. See electromagnetism. Also galvanomagnetic. — Electromagnetic engine, machine. See electric machine, under electric. — Electromagnetic theory of light. See light. — Electromagnetic units, units employed in measuring electric currents, and based upon the force exerted between two magnetic poles, the units practically used to measure the strength of currents (amperes), electromotive force (volts), resistance (ohms), etc., are electromagnetic units.

electromagnetically (ē-lek' trō-mag-net' i-kal-i), adv. In an electromagnetic manner; by electromagnetism.

A single wire bent twice at right angles is made to rotate electro-magnetically between the poles of a horseshoe magnet. Dodge's Electric Illumination, 174.

electromagnetism (ē-lek' trō-mag-net' i-kā), n. The science of electromagnetism.

electromagnetism (ē-lek' trō-mag-net' i-zm), n. The collective term for the phenomena which rest upon the relation between electric currents and magnetism. It comprises the effects of an electric current in directing a magnetic needle and in inducing magnetism in a magnetic substance, as soft iron, and also the analogous effects of a magnet in inducing a movable conductor traversed by a current, or in inducing in a conductor an electric current. The directive power of an electric current upon a magnet was discovered by Oersted; it is the principle involved in all forms of galvanometer (which see). The power of an electric current to induce magnetism, and of a magnet to induce an electric current, is treated under induction; these latter phenomena form the basis of the electromagnet and of all forms of magneto-electric and dynamo electric machines.

electromagnetist (ē-lek' trō-mag-net' i-st), n. One skilled in electromagnetism.

electromassage (ē-lek' trō-ma-sāzh'), n. In therap., the combination of the use of electricity with massage by employing the more or less specially modified electrodes of a galvanic or faradic battery as instruments for more or less imperfect rubbing and kneading.

electromedical (ē-lek' trō-med' i-kal), a. Pertaining to the medicinal use of electricity.

electrometallurgy (ē-lek' trō-met'al-ē-jī), n. The art of depositing certain metals, as gold, silver, copper, etc., from their solutions by means of the slow action of an electric current. Its most important applications are electroplating and electrolysis. The essential parts of the process of plating with copper, for example, are as follows: If the surface upon which the metal is to be deposited is a mold (as of a medal) of gutta porcha or wax, it must be made a conductor by having its surface brushed over with powdered graphite. It is then attached to the negative pole of the battery and suspended in the solution of the required metal, as copper sulphate, the positive pole at the same time consisting of a plate of the same metal. The result of the electrolysis (see electrolysis) caused by the passage of the current is the decomposition of the solution, the metal being deposited upon the exposed surface at the negative pole, and sulphuric acid being formed at the positive pole; the acid, however, dissolves a part of the copperplate, and thus keeps the solution of constant strength. A current of uniform strength is necessary. Iron and nickel are deposited from solutions of their double salts with ammonium; gold and silver from alkaline solutions containing potassium cyanide.

electrometer (ē-lek' trō-mē'tēr), n. [= D. Gal. Dan. Sw. elektrometer = F. électromètre = Sp. electrómetro = Pg. electrometro = It. elettrometro, < Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument for measuring difference of electrostatic potential between two conductors. See potential. There are many forms. The absolute electrometer (also called balance-electrometer) of Sir William Thomson consists essentially of two parallel circular plates attracting each other, the central portion of one of them, the upper, suspended from one arm of a balance or by means of light steel springs, the other being movable to a greater or less distance from the first by means of a micrometer screw. The upper disk is always brought to a fixed position (which can be very accurately determined) by means of the attraction of the lower, the amount of attraction being regulated by the distance between the two plates. It is thus seen that the electric force is actually weighed, and formulas are given by means of which the difference of potentials is deducible in absolute measure. The arms of the plates and the distance between them being known. The quadrant electrometer of Sir William Thomson consists of four quadrant-shaped pieces of metal, sometimes segments of a flat cylindrical box, the alternate pairs being connected by a wire; above or within this, if the cylindrical form is used, a flat needle of aluminium is hung by a delicate wire. The needle is kept in a constant electrical condition by connection usually with a Leyden jar placed above or below, and if the two pairs of quadrants are dissimilarly electrified—that is, are in a state of different potential, as by connecting them respectively with the poles of a voltaic cell—the needle is deflected from its position of rest, and the amount of this deflection, as measured by the motion of a spot of light reflected from a small mirror attached to it, gives a means of calculating the difference of potential of the bodies under experiment. In another method of using the quadrant electrometer the pairs of quadrants are kept at a constant difference of potential, while that of the needle varies. Arranged in this manner, it is much used in the investigation of atmospheric electricity. Lippmann and Dewar have devised very delicate capillary electrometers, based on the alteration of the force of capillarity by electric action. See electrocapillary.

electrometric, electrometrical (ē-lek' trō-met' rīk, -rī-kal), a. [As electrometer + -ic, -ical.] Of or pertaining to electrometry, or the measurement of electricity; as, an electrometrical experiment.

electrometry (ē-lek' trō-mē'trī), n. [As electrometer + -y.] That department of the science of electricity which embraces the methods of making electrical measurements, more especially of static electricity.

electromotion (ē-lek' trō-mō'shōn), n. 1. The current of electricity, or the passing of it from one metal to another, in a voltaic circuit.—2. Mechanical motion produced by means of electricity.

electromotive (ē-lek' trō-mō'tiv), a. Of or pertaining to electromotion; producing or produced by electromotion. — Electromotive force (abbreviated E. M. F.), that which determines the flow of electricity from one place to another, giving rise to an electric current. It is the result of, and proportional to, the difference of electric potential (see potential) between two bodies, or parts of the same body, and bears a similar relation to it that the pressure in a water pipe does to the difference of water level upon which its amount depends. The strength of an electric current is directly proportional to the electromotive force, and inversely proportional to the resistance (Ohm's law). The electromotive force is measured in volts. — Electromotive series, the series of the various metals (or other substances) useful for producing an electric current, arranged in such an order for a given liquid that each is positive with reference to those which follow in the list, and negative for those which precede. For example, in dilute sulphuric acid the order is zinc, lead, iron, copper, silver, platinum, carbon—that is, if zinc and iron are coupled together in a voltaic cell containing sulphuric acid, the zinc is the positive plate, and the current goes in the wire from iron to zinc; if iron and copper are taken, the current in the wire is from copper to iron. It is found that the electromotive force is a maximum for zinc and carbon, and is equal to the sum of the electromotive forces for all the intervening metals. In another liquid the order would be changed, but the above law would hold true, for example, in potassium sulphide, iron is electro-negative with reference to copper. Also called contact series.

electromotograph (ē-lek' trō-mō'tō-grāf), n. A name sometimes applied to a peculiar telephone-receiver invented by Edison. The vibrations of the mica disk by which the sound is reproduced are caused by variations in frictional resistance between a revolving cylinder of lime and a small platinum plate which rests upon its surface and is attached to the center of the disk, these variations being due to variations in the strength of the current transmitted.

electromotor (ē-lek' trō-mō'tor), n. [= F. électromoteur = Sp. electromotor; < L. electrum, amber (repr. electricity), + motor, a mover.] 1. Any arrangement which gives rise to an electric current, as a single cell, a voltaic battery, or a thermo-electric pile.—2. An engine in which electricity is employed to produce mechanical effects. See electric machine, under electric, and motor.

electromuscular (ē-lek' trō-mus' ku-lār), a. Pertaining to the relations between electricity and certain phenomena exhibited by muscles.

electron (ē-lek'trōn), n. Same as electron.

electronegative (ē-lek' trō-neg' a-tiv), a. and n. 1. a. 1. Repelled by bodies negatively electrified, and attracted by those positively electrified; having a tendency to pass to the positive pole in electrolysis.—2. Assuming negative potential when in contact with a dissimilar substance, as copper when joined to zinc in a voltaic cell. See electromotive series, under electromotive.

II. n. A body which, in the process of electrolysis, appears at the positive pole of the voltaic battery. Oxygen is the most electronegative of the elements. See electrolysis.

electronegatively (ē-lek' trō-neg' a-tiv-li), adv. In an electronegative manner.

Such metals as are related electro-negatively to iron. Sci. Amer., N. S., LIV, 324.

electro-optic (ē-lek' trō-op'tik), a. Of or pertaining to electro-optics; as, an electro-optic action.

electro-optics (ē-lek' trō-op'tiks), n. That branch of the science of electricity which treats of its relations to light. Among these relations are the production of double refraction, as in glass, by the electrostatic stress produced when two wires from an induction coil or Holtz machine are fixed in holes in it near together; the rotation of the plane of polarization of a ray of light on traversing a transparent medium placed in a magnetic field, or by reflection at the surface of a magnet; the change of electrical resistance exhibited by certain bodies during exposure to light, as selenium (see photoconductor); and the relation between the index of refraction and the specific inductive capacity of transparent bodies which is established by experiment and required by the electromagnetic theory of light.

electropathic (ē-lek' trō-path'ik), a. [< electro + pathy + -ic.] Pertaining to electropathy. Science, XI., No. 274, adv. p. iii.

electropathy (ē-lek' trōp' a-thī), n. [< Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + πάθος, suffering. Cf. homeopathy.] Treatment of disease by electricity; electrotherapeutics.

electrophone (ē-lek' trō-fōn), n. [< Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + φωνή, voice, sound.] An instrument for producing sounds, resembling trumpet-tones, by electric currents of high tension. It has been recommended for use as a telegraphic relay capable of giving two or four signals with a single wire, having this advantage over other relays that perfection of contact is not necessary to its working. It has been used also to indicate the electric equilibrium of muscle and nervous tissue by the variation of its tones and by a system of levers attached to the wrist to show the rhythm and character of the pulse; and it may be fitted to the telephone, and thus be made to repeat a sound made gently in one place in trumpet-tones in another place hundreds of yards distant. Chambers's Encyclopedia.

electrophori, n. Plural of electrophorus, 1.

electrophorid (ē-lek' trōf' ē-rid), n. A fish of the family Electrophoridae.

Electrophoridae (ē-lek' trō-for' i-dē), n. pl. [NL. < Electrophorus + -idae.] A family of anguilliform fishes, of the order Pleurocentridae. There are no scales nor dorsal fin, the head is rounded in front, the premaxillaries forming most of the upper border of the mouth, and the supramaxillaries being reduced; and the anus is under the throat, the anal fin beginning just behind it, and continuous with the caudal. The family contains the electric eel (which see, under eel). See also Gymnotidae.

electrophoroid (ē-lek' trōf' ē-roid), a. and n. 1. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Electrophoridae.

II. n. One of the Electrophoridae.

electrophorous (ē-lek' trōf' ē-rus), a. [< NL. electrophorus; see electrophorus.] Same as electroferous.

electrophorus (ē-lek' trōf' ē-rus), n. [= F. électrophore = Sp. electróforo, < NL. electrophorus, < Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + φορέω, < φέρω = F. bear.] 1. Pl. electrophori (-ri). An instrument for obtaining static electricity by means of induction. It consists of a disk of resin, or other non-conducting material easily excited by friction, and a polished metal disk with an insulating handle. The resin disk is negatively electrified by striking or rubbing it with a catkin or flannel, and the metal plate is then laid upon it. Under these circumstances the upper plate does not receive a direct charge from the lower, but is positively charged on the lower surface and negatively on the upper; if now the disk is touched by the finger, the negative electricity passes to the ground, leaving the disk charged positively. On being lifted away by its insulating handle, it is found to be charged, and will give a spark. It may then be replaced on the lower plate, and the process repeated an indefinite number of times without any fresh excitation, if the weather is favorable. The electricity obtained each time is the equivalent of the mechanical work done in separating the two surfaces against the attraction of the unlike electricities.

Volta's Electrophorus.

2. [cap.] [NL.] The typical genus of Electrophoridae. There is but one species, the electric eel, E. electricus. Gill, 1864. See eel under eel.

electrophotometer (ē-lek' trō-fō-tōm' ē-tēr), n. An instrument for comparing the intensities of various lights by reference to the intensity of the light produced by an electric spark. See photometer.

electrophotomicrography (ē-lek' trō-fō'tō-mī-krog' rā-fī), n. The art of photographing, by means of the electric light, objects as magnified by the microscope. E. H. Wright.

electrophysiological (ē-lek' trō-fīz' i-ō-ij' i-kal), a. Relating to electrical results produced in living tissues.

electrophysiologist (ē-lek' trō-fīz' i-ō-ij' i-st), n. One who is versed in electrophysiology.

electrophysiology (ē-lek' trō-fīz' i-ō-ij' i-jī), n. That branch of science which treats of electric phenomena produced through physiological agencies.

electroplate (ē-lek'trō-plāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. electroplated, ppr. electroplating. To plate or give a coating of silver or other metal to by means of electrolysis. See electrometallurgy.

To electroplate is to disguise with an adherent thin coating of metal, which then serves as an ornamental covering to the object treated. To electrotype, on the other hand, is to produce a separate and distinct object, with an existence of its own. J. W. Uppert, Electrotyping, p. 4.

electroplate (ē-lek'trō-plāt), n. Articles coated with silver or other metal by the process of electroplating.

electroplater (ē-lek'trō-plā-tēr), n. One who practises electroplating.

electroplating (ē-lek'trō-plā-ting), n. 1. The process or art of coating metals and other materials with an adherent film of metal, in a bath containing a solution of the metal, by means of the electrolytic action of an electric current from a battery or dynamo. In simple forms of electroplating apparatus, the bath containing the metallic solution may form the battery, as in plating with copper. The more common plan is to employ a current obtained from some source outside the bath. Table-cutlery or ware, building- or car-furniture, lamps, etc., to be electroplated, are suspended by wires from a metal rod laid across the top of the bath and connected with the negative pole of the battery, this terminal of the current forming the cathode. The silver, nickel, copper, etc., to be deposited is suspended in like manner from a rod connected with the positive pole of the battery, the terminal forming the anode. (See electrolysis, electrometallurgy.) The deposition of metals by electrolysis forms a part of several arts, as in electrotyping; but as in these the film of metal deposited in the bath is not adherent, they are described under separate heads. Electroplating is strictly the covering of a metal with a metallic film permanently attached to it, as in nickel-plating, plating telegraph-wires with copper, and table-ware with silver. See electrotype, galvanoplastic, galvanoply, galvanograph, and nickel-plating. 2. The deposit itself, or the surface, obtained by means of the process explained above.

electropoison (ē-lek'trō-pō'ison), n. [Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + ποῖον, pp. of ποιεῖν, make.] A mixture of sulphuric acid, bichromate of potash, and water, used as the liquid for batteries in which zinc and carbon are the poles.

electropolar (ē-lek'trō-pō'lār), a. Having, as an electrical conductor, one end or surface positive and the other negative.

electropositive (ē-lek'trō-pōz'i-tiv), a. and n. 1. Attracted by bodies negatively electrified, or by the negative pole of a voltaic battery.—2. Assuming positive potential when in contact with another substance, as zinc in a voltaic cell.

II. n. A body which in electrolysis appears at the negative pole of a voltaic battery. Potassium is the most electropositive of all known bodies. See electrolysis.

electropuncture, electropuncture (ē-lek'trō-punk-tūr-ā'shon, ē-lek'trō-punk'tūr), n. Same as electropuncturing.

electropuncturing (ē-lek'trō-punk'tūr-ing), n. In med., the operation of inserting two or more needles in a part affected and then connecting them with the wires from the poles of a galvanic battery.

electropyrometer (ē-lek'trō-pi-rom'e-tēr), n. See pyrometer.

electroscope (ē-lek'trō-skōp), n. [= D. elektro-skoop = G. Dan. Sw. elektro-skop = F. électroscope = Sp. electroscope = Pg. electroscopio = It. elettroscopio, C. NL. "electroscopium, Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + σκοπεῖν, view.] An instrument for observing or detecting the existence of free electricity, and, in general, for determining its kind. All electroscopes depend for their action on the elementary law of electric forces, that bodies similarly charged repel each other, while bodies dissimilarly charged attract each other. The simplest electroscope consists of pith-balls suspended by silk threads; another simple form consists of a pair of short pieces of straw suspended by silk threads. When not in use the pieces of straw hang down, touching each other. On presenting an electrified body to them they become excited and stand apart, thus giving a test for electricity. The gold-leaf electroscope of Bennet, introduced in 1789, consists of two pieces of gold-leaf, about 1 inch broad, fixed to a brass rod and hung inside a glass globe which has been thoroughly dried, in order that the insulation of the apparatus may be as nearly perfect as possible. The globe is closed with a wooden stopper, through the center of which passes a glass tube containing the brass rod. The upper end of the rod is furnished with a knob. If an electrified body is brought near the top of the instrument, induction takes place; the top becomes electrified oppositely to the body presented, and the pieces of gold-leaf similarly. To find if the latter are positively or negatively charged, a glass rod is rubbed and brought near the knob; if positively charged, the leaves will diverge still more under the induction of the glass; if negatively, they will collapse, the negative electricity being attracted to the positive of the glass rod. In Volta's condensing electroscope, in place of the gilt knob there is a flat metal plate upon which rests another similar plate, which may be removed by an insulating handle.—Quadrant electroscope, a form of pith-ball electroscope which serves to measure roughly the degree of electrification by the rise of the pith-ball as indicated by the motion of the rod carrying it on a graduated semicircle.

Pith-ball Electroscope

Quadrant Electroscope

electroscopic (ē-lek'trō-skōp'ik), a. Of or pertaining to the electroscope; performed by means of the electroscope.

electrosemaphore (ē-lek'trō-sem'a-for), n. A semaphore operated by electricity.

electrostatic, electrostatical (ē-lek'trō-stat'ik, -i-kal), a. Pertaining to static electricity.

Electrostatic units of electricity, those units which are based upon the force exerted between two quantities of static electricity, as units of quantity, potential, etc.

electrostatics (ē-lek'trō-stat'iks), n. The science which treats of the phenomena of static electricity (see electricity), as the mutual attractions or repulsions of electrified bodies, the measurement and distribution of charges of electricity, etc.

That branch of electrical science which treats of the properties of simple electrified bodies is called electrostatics, because in them the electricity is supposed to be at rest. J. E. H. Gordon, Elect. and Mag., I. 28.

electrosteeling (ē-lek'trō-ste'ling), n. The art of electroplating with iron the copperplates used in engraving. See electroplating.

electrostereotype (ē-lek'trō-ste'rē'ō-tīp), n. Same as electrotype.

electrotechnic, electrotechnical (ē-lek'trō-tek'nik, -ni-kal), a. Of or pertaining to electrotechnics.

electrotechnics (ē-lek'trō-tek'niks), n. The methods, processes, and operations made use of in the application of electricity to the arts.

electrotherapeutic (ē-lek'trō-ther-a-pi'tik), a. Of or pertaining to electrotherapeutics.

electrotherapeutics (ē-lek'trō-ther-a-pi'tiks), n. The treatment of disease by means of electricity; the principles and doctrines of such treatment as a branch of medicine; electropathy.

electrotherapist (ē-lek'trō-ther-a-pi'tist), n. One who studies or practises electrotherapeutics.

electrotherapy (ē-lek'trō-ther-a-pi), n. Same as electrotherapeutics.

electrothermancy (ē-lek'trō-ther'man-si), n. [Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + θερμαινέω, a heating, C. ἡ ψευδα, heat, C. θερμός, hot.] That branch of electrical science which investigates the effects produced by the electric current upon the temperature of a conductor or part of a circuit composed of two different metals.

electrothermotic (ē-lek'trō-ther-mot'ik), a. Of or relating to heat generated by electricity.

electrothin (ē-lek'trō-tin), v. t.; pret. and pp. electrothinned, ppr. electrothinning. To electroplate with tin. See electroplating.

electrotint (ē-lek'trō-tint), n. Same as electrothinning.

electrotinting (ē-lek'trō-tin'ting), n. A method of making a design, etc., in relief, for printing, by drawing the lines on a metal plate with some varnish which resists the action of acids, and placing it in an electrobath, when the exposed portions are bitten in, leaving the protected parts in relief.

electrotome (ē-lek'trō-tōm), n. [Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + τομή, cutting, verbal adj. of τέμνω, to cut, cut.] An automatic circuit-breaker. Greer, Dict. of Elect., p. 54.

electrotonic (ē-lek'trō-ton'ik), a. 1. Of or pertaining to electrical tension; applied by Faraday to what at one time he erroneously believed to be a peculiar latent state or condition of a conductor near another conductor through which an electric current was flowing.—2. Of, pertaining to, or produced by electrotonus.

electrotonicity (ē-lek'trō-tō-ni-si'ti), n. [electrotonic + -ity.] Same as electrotonus.

electrotonize (ē-lek'trō-tō-niz), v. t.; pret. and pp. electrotonized, ppr. electrotonizing. [electrotonic + -ize.] To alter the normal electric current of, as a nerve. See electrotonus.

electrotonous (ē-lek'trō-tō-nus), a. 1. Of or pertaining to electrical tension.—2. Of, pertaining to, or produced by electrotonus.

electrotonus (ē-lek'trō-tō-nus), n. [Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + τόνος, tension; see tone.] The altered state of a nerve or a muscle during the passage of a galvanic current through it. The irritability is heightened in the neighborhood of the cathode and diminished in that of the anode. The currents of rest in the nerve are increased or diminished according as they run in the same or an opposite direction to that of the galvanic current. Also electrotonus, electrotonicity.

electrotype (ē-lek'trō-tīp), n. [= F. électrotype; Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + τύπος, figure, image; see type.] A copy in metal (precipitated by galvanic or electric action, usually in the form of a thin sheet) of any engraved or molded surface. Copies of medals, jewelry, and silverware, of woodcuts and pages of composed type, are common forms of electrotypes. The metal most used is copper, and the largest application of the process is to the preparation of plates for printing. The form of composed type is molded in wax, which is dusted or coated with black-lead in order to make it a conductor. The wax mold is suspended in a galvanic bath of sulphate of copper through which a current of electricity is passed. The thin sheet of copper which attaches to the mold is afterward backed with stereotype metal. Also electrotype, and commonly abbreviated electro.

electrotype (ē-lek'trō-tīp), v. t.; pret. and pp. electrotyped, ppr. electrotyping. [= F. électrotyper; from the noun.] To make a plate copy or plate copies of by electrical deposition.

electrotyper (ē-lek'trō-tī-pēr), n. 1. One who makes electrotypes.—2. The vat in which the electrotyping solution is held. [Eng.] electrotypic (ē-lek'trō-tīp'ik), a. Pertaining to or effected by means of electrotyping.

electrotyping (ē-lek'trō-tī-ping), n. The art or process of making electrotypes. Also called galvanoplastic process.

electrotypist (ē-lek'trō-tī-pist), n. [electrotype + -ist.] One who practises electrotyping.

electrotypy (ē-lek'trō-tī-pi), n. [= F. électrotypie; see electrotype + -y.] The process of electrotyping. Also called galvanoplastic.

electrovection (ē-lek'trō-vek'shon), n. [L. electrum, amber (repr. electricity), + vectio(n-), a carrying, C. vehere, pp. vectus, carry; see connection, etc., vehicle.] Same as electrical endosmosis (which see, under endosmosis).

electrovital (ē-lek'trō-vi'tal), a. Electrical and dependent upon vital processes.

electrum (ē-lek'trum), n. [Also electron; = F. électrum = Sp. Pg. electro = It. elettro, C. L. electrum, amber (called in pure L. succinum), also the metalline compound so called, C. Gr. ἤλεκτρον, or ἤλεκτρον, amber, also an alloy of gold and silver, akin to ἤλεκτρον, the bounding sun, also fire as an element; to ἡλεκτρα, a fem. name; and prob. to ἤλεκτρον, the sun, archia, flame, arch, beam, stone.] A word used by Greek (ἤλεκτρον) and Latin (electrum) authors with various meanings at various times. From the time of Herodotus on its most common meaning in Greek was 'amber,' but it was also used for 'pure gold,' as by Sophocles. The Romans used electrum with the meaning of 'amber,' always designating an alloy, which might be either natural or artificial, of silver and gold (Pliny gives the amount of silver present in electrum at one fifth of the whole). Later on, electrum was confounded with orichalcum (which see), and in the middle ages had acquired the definite meaning of 'brass.' At all times, and especially among the Latin writers, there was more or less uncertainty in regard to the meaning of this word, and there was a tendency among both Greeks and Romans to use it just as adamant was frequently used, namely, as designating some ideal, imperfectly known substance possessed of almost miraculous properties.

electuary (ē-lēk'ŭ-ā-ri), n.; pl. electuaries (-riz). [Also formerly electury; = OF. electuare, F. electuaire = Sp. Pg. electuario = It. electuario (also formerly, by aphoresis, lectuary, < ME. lectuarie, < OF. lectuare = Pr. lectuari, lectuari, = It. lectuario, lectuario, > G. lectur = Dan. lectur = Sw. lectur), < L. electuarium, also electarium, an uccom. (in simulation of L. electus, picked out; cf. ML. electuarium, the élite of a troop of soldiers) of electuarium (with L. sullix -arium), < Gr. ἐκλεκτόν (with equiv. ἐκλεγεῖν, > L. eligere, eligere, an electuary, < ἐκλεγεῖν, lick up, < ἐκ, out, + λεγεῖν, lick: see lick). In phar., a medicine composed of powders or other ingredients, incorporated with some conserve, honey, or syrup, originally made in a form to be licked by the patient.

"How do you do, my honest friend?" . . . "Very weakly, sir, since I took the electuary," answered the patient. Scott, Abbot, xvi.

Eledone (el-e-dō'nē), n. [NL. (Lewch, 1817), < Gr. ἐλεδώνη, a kind of polypus.] A genus of Eledone teuthoidea.

cephalopods, typical of the family Eledonidae. E. varrucosa and E. cirrhosa are examples.

Eledonid (ē-lēd'ō-nid), n. A cephalopod of the family Eledonidae.

Eledonidae (ē-lēd'ō-ni-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Eledone + -idae.] A family of cephalopod cephalopods, characterized by the development of but one row of suckers along each arm, but otherwise very similar to the Octopodidae, with which they are generally associated.

eleemosynarily (ē-lē-mōs'i-ni-ri-lī), adv. In an eleemosynary manner; by way of charity; charitably.

eleemosynariness (ē-lē-mōs'i-ni-ri-nēs), n. 1. The quality of being charitable.—2. The disposition to receive alms. Bailey, 1727.

eleemosynary (ē-lē-mōs'i-ni-ri), a. and n. [ML. eleemosynarius, pertaining to alms, one who gives or receives alms, < eleemosyna, < Gr. ἐλεημοσύνη, alms: see alms, and cf. almshouse, ult. a doublet of eleemosynary.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to alms; derived from or provided by charity; charitable: as, an eleemosynary fund; an eleemosynary hospital.

Religious relief never yet tranquillized the working-classes—it never made them grateful. It is not in human nature that it should. Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, xvi.

The beds of patients (in the hospital at Beauve) are draped in curtains of dark red cloth, the traditional uniform of these eleemosynary couches.

H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 251.

2. Relating to charitable donations; intended for the distribution of alms, or for the use and management of donations and bequests, whether for the subsistence of the poor or for the conferring of any gratuitous benefit.

The eleemosynary sort (of corporations) are such as are constituted for the perpetual distribution of the free alms, or bounty, of the founder of them to such persons as he has directed. Blackstone, Com., I. xviii.

Eleemosynary corporations are for the management of private property according to the will of the donors. B. Webster, Speech, March 10, 1818.

3. Dependent upon charity; receiving charitable aid or support: as, the eleemosynary poor.

In the accounts of Moxtoke priory, near Coventry, in the year 1430, it appears that the eleemosynary boys, or choristers, of that monastery acted a play. T. Warren, Hist. Eng. Poetry, II. 380.

Eleemosynary corporation. See corporation.

II. n.; pl. eleemosynaries (-riz). One who subsists on charity; one who lives by receiving alms.

Living as an eleemosynary upon a perpetual contribution from all and every part of the creation. South, Sermons, III. 1.

elegance (el'ē-gāns), n. [= D. elegantie = G. eleganz = Dan. elegance = Sw. elegans, < OF. elegance, F. elegance = Sp. Pg. elegancia = It. eleganza, < L. elegantia, elegance, < elegans (t-), elegant: see elegant.] 1. The state or quality of being elegant; beauty resulting from perfect propriety or from exact fitness, symmetry, or the like; refinement of manner, quality, or appearance: as, elegance of dress.

Soracte, in January and April, rises from its blue horizon like an island from the sea, with an elegance of contour which no mood of the year can deepen or diminish.

H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 152.

Gray's perfect elegance could nowhere have found a more admirable foil than in the vulgar jauntness and clumsy drollery of his correspondent, Mason.

Lowell, New Princeton Rev., I. 167.

2. That which pleases by its nicety, symmetry, purity, or beauty; an elegance: as, the elegances of polite society. — Syn. 1. Grace, beauty, polish. See comparison under elegant.

elegancy (el'ē-gān-si), n.; pl. elegancies (-siz).

1. The quality of being elegant; elegance. [Rare.]

Let there be two delicate or rich cabinets, daintily paved, richly hangings, glazed with crystalline glass, and a rich cupola in the midst, and all other elegancy that may be thought upon. Bacon, Baldwin (ed. 1867).

2. That which imparts elegance; an elegant characteristic or quality.

Such kind of inspired knowledge of strange tongues as includes all the native peculiarities, which, if you will, you may call their elegancies. Warburton, Doctrine of Grace, I. 8.

The beautiful wildness of nature, without the nicer elegancies of art. Spectator, No. 477.

elegant (el'ē-gānt), a. [= D. G. Dan. Sw. ellegant, < OF. elegant, F. élegant = Sp. Pg. It. elegante, < L. elegant (t-), sometimes spelled eligan (t-), of persons, luxurious, fastidious, choice, dainty, fine, tasteful, elegant; of things, choice, neat, fine, elegant; in form ppr. of an unused verb elegare*, prob. equiv. to eligare, ppr. eligit (t-), choose, pick out: see elect, eligible.] 1. Having good or fine taste; nice in taste; fastidious; sensible to beauty or propriety; discriminating beauty from deformity or imperfection: said of persons.

Under this contrariety of identification, an elegant critic aptly describes him.

Pattenham, Arte of Eng. Poets, Int., p. vi.

Eye, now I see thou art exact of taste, And elegant, of sapience no small part. Milton, P. L., ix. 1019.

2. Polished; polite; refined; graceful: said of persons: as, an elegant lady or gentleman. — 3. Characterized by or pertaining to good taste; indicating a refined propriety of taste: as, elegant manners.

Why will you endeavour to make yourself so disagreeable to me, and thwart me in every little elegant expense? Sheridan, School for Scandal, II. 1.

4. Expressed with taste and neatness; correct and polished in expression or arrangement: as, an elegant style of composition; elegant speech.

I have likewise heard this elegant distinction. Corbett, Credulities, I. 39.

Whoever wishes to attain an English style familiar but not coarse, and elegant but not ostentatious, must give his days and nights to the volumes of Addison.

Johnson, Addison.

He entered the Church early, but devoted himself to the study of canon law and of elegant literature.

Tucknor, Span. Lit., I. 411.

5. Pleasing to the eye by grace of form or delicacy of color; characterized by exquisiteness of design or fine taste; free from coarseness, blemish, or other defect; refined: as, an elegant figure; an elegant vase; an elegant structure. — 6. Pleasing to the mind, as exhibiting fine perception of what is required; calculated to effect its purpose with exceeding accuracy, delicacy, and neatness; exquisitely ingenious or appropriate: as, an elegant modification of a philosophical instrument; an elegant algebraical formula or mathematical demonstration; an elegant chess problem.

An elegant sufficiency, content, Retirement, rural quiet. Thomson, Spring, I. 1168.

Syn. Elegant, Graceful, tasteful, courtly. Elegant implies that anything of an artificial character to which it is applied is the result of training and cultivation through the study of models or ideals of grace; graceful implies less of consciousness, and suggests often a natural gift. A rustic, uneducated girl may be naturally graceful, but not elegant. We speak of elegant manners, composition, furniture, taste, but of a graceful tree, lawn, child; the playful movements of a kitten may be graceful. See beautiful.

His easy art may happy nature seem, Trifles themselves are elegant to him. Pope, Epistle to Miss Mount, l. 4.

Not proudly high nor meanly low, A graceful myrtle reared its head. Montemery, The Myrtle.

elegantemente (ē-lē-gān-te-men'te), adv. [It., elegantemente, < elegante, elegant, + mente, an adv. suffix, orig. abl. of L. ment (t-), mind, with preceding ad in agreement.] With elegance: in a graceful and pleasing style: a direction in music.

elegantly (el'ē-gānt-lī), adv. In an elegant manner; with elegance.

Sir Henry Wotton . . . delivered his ambassage most elegantly in the Italian language.

I. Walton, Sir H. Wotton.

Dr. Warren preached before the Princess . . . of the blessedness of the pure in heart, most elegantly describing the bliss of the beatific vision.

Evelyn, Diary, Oct. 24, 1688.

elegiac (ē-lē-jī-ak or ē-lē-jī'ak), a. and n. [Formerly elegiack; = F. élegiaque = Sp. elegiaco = Pg. It. elegiaco, < L. elegiacus, < Gr. ἐλεγιάς, < ἐλεγειν, to elegeize, an elegy: see elegy.] I. a.

1. In anc. pros., an epithet noting a distich the first line of which is a dactylic hexameter and the second a pentameter, or verse differing from the hexameter by suppression of the arsis or metrically unaccented part of the third and the sixth foot, thus:

— — — — — | — — — — — | — — — — — | — — — — — | — — — — — | — — — — —

Verses or poems consisting of elegiac distichs are called elegiac verses or poems (elegiacs), poetry composed in this meter, elegiac verse or poetry (the elegy); and the writers who employed this verse, especially those who employed it exclusively or by preference, are known as the elegiac poets. Elegiac verse seems to have been used primarily in threnetic pieces (poems lamenting or commemorating the dead), or to have been associated with music of a kind regarded by the Greeks as mournful. Almost from its first appearance in literature, however, it is found used for compositions of various kinds. The principal Roman elegiac poets are Catullus, Tibullus, Propertius, and Ovid. In modern German literature the elegiac meter has been frequently used, especially by Goethe and Schiller. Coleridge's translation from the latter poet may serve as an example in English.

In the hex | ameter | rises the | fountain's | silvery | cold |

In the pen | tameter | aye | falling in | melody | back. Coleridge, The Oldman Elegiac Meter.

You should crave his rule For pauses in the elegiac couplet, chasms Permissible only to Catullus.

Drumming, Ring and Book, I. 376.

2. Belonging to an elegy, or to elegy; having to do with elegies.

Arnold is a great elegiac poet, but there is a buoyancy in his elegy which we rarely find in the best elegy, and which certainly adds greatly to its charm.

Contemporary Rev., XLIX. 228.

Hence — 3. Expressing sorrow or lamentation: as, elegiac strains.

Let elegiac lay the woe relate, Soft as the breath of distant flutes. Gay, Trivia.

Mr. Lyttleton is a gentle elegiac person. Gray, Letters, I. 220.

II. n. In pros.: (a) A pentameter, or verse consisting of two dactylic penthemims or written in elegiac meter. (b) pl. A succession of distichs consisting each of a dactylic hexameter and a dipenthemim; a poem or poems in such distichs: as, the Heroides and Tristia of Ovid are written in elegiacs. See I.

elegiacal (ē-lē-jī'a-kal), a. [< elegiac + -al.] Same as elegiac.

He was the author of a very large number of volumes of lyrical, elegiacal and romantic verse. The American, VIII. 251.

elegiacal, n. Plural of elegiacal.

elegiac (ē-lē-jī-ak), a. and n. [< Gr. ἐλεγιάς, the meter of the elegy, + ιαπάδος, iambic: see elegy and iambic.] I. a. Consisting of half an elegiac pentameter followed by an iambic dimeter: being or constituting an elegiac verse (which see): as, an elegiac verse.

II. n. A verse consisting of a dactylic penthemim followed by an iambic dimeter; an elegiac verse (which see).

elegiacus (ē-lē-jī-am'bus), n.; pl. elegiaci (-bi). [LL. (Marius Victorinus, Arts Gram., iv.), < L. elegia, elegy, + iambus, iambus.] A compound verse, consisting of a dactylic penthemim (group of two dactyls and the thesis or long syllable of a third) and an iambic dimeter, thus:

— — — — — | — — — — — | — — — — — | — — — — — | — — — — — | — — — — —

elegist (ē-lē-jī-ast or ē-lē-jī'ast), n. [< elegy (L. elegia) + -ast.] An elegist. [Rare.]

The great fault of these elegists is, that they are in despair for griefs that give the sensible part of mankind very little pain.

Coleridge, Vicar, xvi.

elegiographer (ē-lē-jī-og'ra-fēr), n. [< Gr. ἐλεγειογράφος, a writer of elegies, < ἐλεγειν, to elegeize, + γράφειν, write.] A writer of elegies, or of poems in elegiac verse. [Rare.]

Elegiographer, one who writes mournful songs. Coleridge.

elegious (ē-lē-jī-us), a. [< Gr. ἐλεγειος, elegiac, < ἐλεγειν, to elegeize, an elegy.] Elegiac; hence, lamenting; melancholy. [Rare.]

If your elegiac breath should hap to rouse
A happy tear, close harb'ring in his eye,
Then urge his plighted faith.

Quarles, Emblems, v. 1.

elogist (el'ô-jist), n. [< elegy + -ist.] A writer of elegies.

Our elogist, and the chroniclers, impute the crime of withholding so pious a legacy to the advice of the king of France. T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, I. 108.

eligit (el'ô-jit), v. [L., he has chosen: 3d pers. sing. perf. ind. of eligere, choose: see elect.] 1. In law, in England and in some of the United States, a judicial writ of execution, which may at the election of the creditor issue on a judgment or on a forfeiture of recognizance, commanding the sheriff to take the judgment debtor's goods, and, if necessary thereafter, his lands, and deliver them to the judgment creditor, who can retain them until the satisfaction of the judgment.—2. The title to land held under execution of a writ of eligit.

elogize (el'ô-jiz), v. t. or t.; pret. and pp. elogized, ppr. elogizing. [< elegy + -ize.] To write or compose elegies; celebrate or lament after the style of an elegy; bewail.

I . . . perhaps should have elogized on for a page or two farther, when Harry, who has no idea of the dignity of grief, interrupted me. H. Walpole, Letters, II. 371.

elegy (el'ô-jî), n.; pl. elegies (-jiz). [Formerly elegiac; = D. G. elegia = Dan. Sw. elegi, < OF. elegue, F. elegie = Sp. elegia = Pg. It. elegia, < L. elegia, also elegia, elegia, < Gr. elegia, fem. sing., but orig. neut. pl., τὰ ἐλεγία, an elegiac poem, in reference to the meter (later a lament, an elegy), pl. of ἐλεγειον, a distich consisting of a hexameter and a pentameter (> L. elegium, elegium, elegion, elegion, an elegy; cf. L. dim. elegion, elegidion, a short elegy, neut. (se. metron, meter, or zeugon, poem) of ἐλεγειον, prop. pertaining to a song of mourning, elegiac, < ἐλεος, a song of mourning, a lament, later (in reference to the usual meter of such songs) any poem in distichs; origin unknown. The usual derivation from ἐλεος, 'very woe! woe!' a refrain in such songs (ἐλεος or rather ἐλεος, an interjection of pain or grief, like E. ah, ay, etc.; ay, 2d pers. sing. impv. of αἶω, say), is no doubt erroneous.] 1. In classical poetry, a poem written in elegiac verse.

The third sorrowing was of lonks, by long lamentation in Elegie so was their song called, and it was in a piteous manner of metre, placing a limping Pentameter after a lusty Hexameter, which made it godolomously more than any other meter. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 59.

2. A mournful or plaintive poem; a poem or song expressive of sorrow and lamentation; a dirge; a funeral song.

And there is such a solemn melody,

'Tween doleful songs, tears and elegies.

Webster, White Devil, v. 1.

Let Swans from their forsaken Rivers fly,
And sick'ning at her Tomb, make haste to dye,
That they may help to sing her Elegy.

Compton, Death of Queen Mary

3. A serious poem pervaded by a tone of melancholy, whether grief is actually expressed or not; as, Gray's "Elegy in a Country Churchyard."

Elegy is the form of poetry natural to the reflective mind. It may treat of any subject, but it must treat of no subject for itself, but always and exclusively with reference to the poet himself. Coleridge.

4. In music, a sad or funeral composition, vocal or instrumental, whether actually commemorative or not; a dirge.—Syn. Dirge, Requiem, etc. See dirge.

oleidin (ol'ô-jî-din), n. [< Gr. ὀλεῖν, olive-oil, oil + -idin + -in2.] In chem., a substance found in the stratum granulosum and elsewhere in the epidermis, and staining very deeply with carmine: regarded by Waldeyer as identical with hyaline, and called on that account by Unna carotinhyalin.

element (el'ô-ment), n. [< ME. element, < OF. element, F. élément = Sp. Pg. It. elemento = D. G. Dan. Sw. element, < L. elementum, a first principle, element, rudiment, pl. first principles, the elements (of existing things), the elements of knowledge, the alphabet; origin uncertain. The common derivation of the word from alere, nourish, which would identify elementum with alimentum, nourishment (see aliment), is wholly improbable. Several other derivations have been proposed, of which one assumes the orig. sense to be 'the alphabet,' the 'A-B-C,' or lit. the 'L-M-N,' the word being formed, in this view, < el + em + en, the names of the letters L, M, N, + the term. -um, as in the common formative -mentum, E. -ment.] 1. That of which anything is in part compounded, which exists in it, and which is itself not decomposable into parts of different kinds; a fundamental or ultimate part or principle; hence, in general, any component part; any constituent part or principle.

Thought
Alone, and its quick elements, will, passion, Reason, imagination, cannot die. Shelley, Hellas.

Noble architecture is one element of culture.

Lowell, Fireside Travels, p. 92.

That element of tragedy which lies in the very fact of frequency has not yet wrought itself into the coarse emotion of mankind. George Eliot, Middlemarch, I. 214.

Three tribes, settlers on three hills, were the elements of which the original [Roman] commonwealth was made. E. A. Freeman, Amer. Rev., p. 286.

Specifically—(a) An ingredient, especially of the temperament.

There's little of the melancholy element in her, my lord. Skelton, Much Ado, II. 1.

(b) pl. The rudimentary principles of any science, as Euclid's "Elements." (Gr. στοιχεῖα), a work setting forth in an orderly and logical way the simple and fundamental propositions of geometry. (c) In geom., one of the points, lines, or planes or other geometrical forms, by which a figure or geometrical construction is made up. "Space may be considered as a geometrical figure, whose elements are either points or planes. Taking the point as elements, the straight lines of space are so many ranges, and the planes of space so many planes of points. If, on the other hand, the planes are considered as elements, the straight line of space is the axis of so many axial pencils, and points of space are centers of so many spheres of planes." (Cromwell, Geom., tr. by Lancelotti, § 31.) (d) In math., one of a number of objects arranged in a symmetrical or regular figure. "The elements of a determinant are the quantities arranged in a square block or matrix, the sum of whose products forms the determinant." (e) In astron., one of the quantities necessary to be known in calculating the place of a planet (perhaps because the planets were called elements). They are six, namely, the longitude of the ascending node, the inclination of the orbit to the ecliptic, the longitude of the perihelion, the mean distance from the sun, the mean longitude at any epoch, and the eccentricity. Hence. (f) A datum required for the solution of any problem. (g) pl. The bread and wine used in the eucharist, collectively called communion elements.

When all have communicated, the Bishop shall return to the Lord's Table, and reverently place upon it what remaineth of the consecrated Elements, covering the same with a fair linen cloth.

Book of Common Prayer, Holy Communion.

(h) In bot., one of the primary or embryological parts composing the body of an animal, or of the parts which have united to form any part. Thus the thorax of an insect is composed of three principal elements or pieces, the epinotum is formed of several elements or pieces which are soldered together, etc. (i) In elect., a voltaic cell. See cell.

The dichromate of potassium has been composed of four troughs with six compartments, making twenty four elements in circuit. A mercury calculator enabled us to use at pleasure six, twelve, eighteen, or twenty four elements, and thus to obtain four different speeds of the screw [of an electric balloon]. See See, III. 154.

2. One of the four things, fire, water, earth, and air (to which ether was added as a fifth element), falsely regarded by the ancients as the constituents of which all things are composed. 4. Water, as an element, consists of all that in the rain, the rivers, the sea, etc., line of lightning, the sun, etc., these, together with the air and earth, were supposed to make up the matter of nature. The elements often means in a particular sense wind and water, especially in action, as the fury of the elements.

"It is a water that is named Æger,"

Of elements four, quod Plato.

Chaucer, Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 864, G. 1 1464.

ge have thanne in the ampulle of elementis that is to seie, water and air.

Book of Quene Elizabeth, l. 1464.

My Arce! check,

That is thy charge, then to the elements!

Be free, and fare thee well! Shak., Tempest, v. 1.

I've heard

Schooling a affirm, man's body is composed

Of the four elements. Mac-sweeney, Rhapsody, l. 2.

And, last, each hum an' trace, an' purring up

Thine individual being, shalt thou go

To mix for ever with the elements.

Elegant, Thucydides.

3. A kind of matter under composable into other kinds. The elements as enumerated by Empedocles, and generally recognized in antiquity, were four, fire, water, earth, and air. (See see.) The 4th century of the fifth century, and later, recognized three elements—sulphur, mercury, and salt. In modern chemistry, an element, or elementary body, is regarded as a simple substance which has hitherto resisted analysis by any known chemical means. The list of such elements is a provisional one, since it is possible, and not improbable, that many bodies now considered elementary may be proved to be compound. There are over 70 elements at present (1890) recognized by chemists, commonly divided into two groups, namely, metals and the non-metallic bodies or metalloids. The non-metallic elements are hydrogen, chlorine, bromine, iodine, fluorine, oxygen, sulphur, selenium, tellurium, nitrogen, phosphorus, arsenic, antimony, bismuth, boron, silicon, and carbon. (See metallurgy.) The remaining elements are regarded as metals. (See metals.) Five of the elements—oxygen, nitrogen, hydrogen, chlorine, and fluorine—are gases at ordinary temperatures; two, bromine and mercury, are liquids; the rest are solids. The properties of all the elements bear a close relation to their atomic weights. (See periodic law, under periodic.) The following is a list of the elements with symbols and atomic weight.

Elements.	Symbols.	Atomic Weight.
Aluminium	Al	27.1
Antimony	Sb	120
Arsenic	As	75
Barium	Ba	137.4
Beryllium (see glucinum)	Be	—
Bismuth	Bi	208
Boron	B	10.9
Bromine	Br	79.9
Cadmium	Cd	112.3
Cæsium	Cs	132.9
Calcium	Ca	40
Carbon	C	12
Cerium	Ce	140
Chlorine	Cl	35.4
Chromium	Cr	52.1
Cobalt	Co	59
Columbium (see niobium)	—	—
Copper	Cu	63.6
Dysprosium	Dy	147
Erbium	Er	167
Fluorine	F or Fl	19.0
Gallium	Ga	70

Uranium	U	240
Vanadium	V	51.4
Ytterbium	Yb	173
Yttrium	Y	89
Zinc	Zn	65.4
Zirconium	Zr	90.6

There are a number of other bodies which have been named as elements (as phosphorus, boron, etc.), whose properties have, however, not yet been sufficiently investigated and defined to warrant their inclusion in the list.

4. The proper or natural environment of a thing; that in which something exists; hence the sphere of experience of a person; the class of persons with whom one naturally associates, or the sphere of life with which one is familiar; as, he is out of his element.

We are simple men; we do not know what's brought pass under the protection of fortune falling. She was by charms, by spells, by the flame, and such dexterity this is beyond our element. We know nothing. Shak., M. W. of W., iv.

This Tim is the head of a species, he has a little out his element in this town, but he has a relation of tranquillity and his neighbour in the country, who is the true ph of residence for this species. Steele, Tatler, No.

Circulating element. See circulate. Double element. See double.

Element of a figure. In the calculus, infinite small part of it. Elements of a crystal. See crystal.

Magnetic elements of a place. The declination and inclination of the magnetic needle, and intensity of the earth's magnetic attraction. Osculating elements. See osculate.

element (el'ô-ment), n. t. [< element, n.] To compound of elements or first principles.

Whether any one such body be met with, in these s to be elemented bodies, I now question. Bos.

2. To constitute; form from elements; compose; enter into the constitution of.

Dull, elementary loves a love.

(Where soul is sent) cannot admit

Of absence, 'cause it both remove

The thing which elemented it.

Dennis, Vindication Forbidding Mourning

These [good life and good works] are the two elements, and he which is elemented from these hath the complexion of a good man, and a fit friend. Donne, Letters, xxx.

elemental (el-e-men'tal), a. and n. [= Sp. Fig. elemental; as element + -al.] 1. a. 1. Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of an element or elements.

In and near the photosphere, or immediately it, matter must be in its most elemental state.

C. A. Young, The Sun, p. 90.

There is spectroscopic evidence which seems to show that, starting with a mass of solid elemental matter, such mass of matter is continually broken up as the temperature is raised. J. N. Lockyer, Spect. Anal., p. 126.

2. Pertaining or relating to first principles; simple; elementary. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Some elemental knowledge, I suppose, the y [the druids] had; but I can scarcely be persuaded that their learning was either deep or extensive.

Burke, Abolig. of Eng. Hist., I. 1.

3. Of or pertaining to the elements of the material world; more especially used of the mobile elements, fire, air, and water, with reference to their violent or destructive action. See element, 2 and 3.

If dusky spots are vary'd on his brow,
And streak'd with red, a troubled colour show,
That subtle mixture shall at once declare Whole, rain, and storms, and elemental war.

Dryden, Tr. of Virgil's Georgics.

But all subtilties by elemental strife;
And passions are the element of life.

Pope, Essay on Man, l. 100.

Elemental law of thought, a first principle; a fundamental belief.

II. n. A spirit of the elements; a nature-spirit. See I., 3, and element, 2 and 3.

elementalism (el-e-men'tal-izm), n. [< elemental + -ism.] The theory which identifies the divinity of the ancients with the elemental powers. Gluckstone.

elementality (el-e-men-tal'i-ti), n. [< elemental + -ity.] The state of being elemental or elementary.

By this I hope the elementality (that is, the universality) of detraction, or disparagement, . . . is out of dispute.

Whitlock, Manners of Eng. People, p. 100.

elementally (el-e-men'tal-i), adv. In an elemental manner; with reference to or as regards elements.

Those words taken chemically, without regard to any precedent law of Moses, are as much against plain equity . . . as those words of "Take, eat, this is my body," elementally understood, are against nature and sense.

Christian Believer's Appeal, xv. (ord MS.).

Legislate as you please, you cannot abolish the fact of the sexes. Constitutionally, elementally the same, Man and Woman are organized on different bases. Take the stars, they differ in their glory.

G. D. Burdman, Creative Week, p. 100.

elementary (el-e-men'tar-i), a. [< L. elemental-ia; see elementary.] Elementary.

What thing occasioned the shower of rayne
Of fyre elemental in his supreme spirit.

Skelton, Garland of Laurel.

elementariness (el-e-men'tar-i-ness), n. The state of being elementary.

elementarity (el-e-men-tar'i-ti), n. [< elementary + -ity.] Elementariness.

For though Moses have left no mention of minerals, nor made any other description then sues into the apparent and visible creation, yet is there unquestionably a very large class of creatures in the earth far above the condition of elementarity. See F. Brown, Vulg. Err., li. 1.

elementary (el-e-men'tar-i), a. [= D. elementar = G. elementar (in comp.), also elementarisch = Dan. elementar = Sw. elementar (D. Dan. Sw. after F.) (Dan. Sw. also elementar in comp.) = F. élémentaire = Pr. Sp. Pg. elementar, Pg. also elementario = It. elementare, elementario, < L. elementarius, belonging to the elements or rudiments, < elementum, element, rudiment; see element.] 1. Pertaining to or of the nature of an element or elements; primary; simple; uncompounded; incomplex; as, an elementary substance.

They [chemists] have found it impossible to obtain from oxygen anything but oxygen, or from hydrogen anything but hydrogen, and in the present state of our knowledge, these bodies are consequently regarded as elementary or simple substances. Huxley, Physiology, p. 105.

Without ritual, religion may exist in its elementary state, and thus elementary state of religion is what may be described as habitual and permanent adoration.

J. K. Seelye, Nat. Religion, p. 70.

The primitive homestead, . . . where all things were elementary and of the plainest cast.

Stedman, Poets of America, p. 101.

2. Initial; rudimental; containing, teaching, or discussing first principles, rules, or rudiments; as, an elementary treatise or disquisition; elementary education; elementary schools.

It is probable that before the time of Aristotle there were elementary treatises of geometry which are now lost.

Reed, Inquiry into Human Mind.

Such a pedantic abuse of elementary principles as would have disgraced boys at school. Burke, Army Estimates.

3. Treating of elements; collecting, digesting, or explaining principles; as, an elementary writer.

Elementary analysis, in chem., the estimation of the amounts of the elements which together form a compound body. Elementary angles, in crystal., angles between particular faces characteristic of particular minerals.

Elementary body, See element, 3. Elementary particles of Zimmermann, see blood plate. Elementary proposition, a self-evident and indemonstrable proposition. Elementary substances, See element, 3.

elementation (el-e-men-ta'shon), n. [< element, + -ation.] Instruction in elements or first principles. Coleridge. [Rare.]

elementish (el-e-men'tish), a. [< element + -ish.] Elemental; elementary.

If you mean of many natures conspiring together, as in a popular government, to establish this fair estate, as if the elementish and ethereal parts should in their town house set down the bounds of each one's office, then consider what follows: that there must needs have been a wisdom which made them concur. See P. Solen, Arcadia, li.

elementoid (el-e-men'toid), a. [*< L. elementum + Gr. oides, form*.] Like an element; having the appearance of a simple substance; as, compounds which have an elementoid nature, and perform elemental functions.

elemi (el'e-mi), n. [= F. elemi = Sp. elemi = Pg. It. elemi; of Eastern, said to be of Ar., origin.] A name of fragrant resins of various kinds, all of them probably the product of trees belonging to the natural order Burseraceae. The oriental or African elemi of the older writers is an exudation from Boswellia Frereana, a tree found in the region south of the gulf of Aden. It is used in the East for chewing, like mastic. The elemi of pharmacy comes chiefly from Manila, and is the product of Canarium commune. It is a stolid resin, and is used in plasters and ointments. Other sorts are Mexican or Vera Cruz elemi, obtained from species of Bursera; Brazilian elemi, from various species of Protium (Uroea); and Mauritanian elemi, from Canarium punctatum.

elemine (el'e-mine), n. [< elemi + -ine.] The crystallizable portion of elemi.

elench (ē-leng'k), n. [< L. elenchus, < Gr. ἐλέγχω, to argue, an argument of disproof or refutation, a cross-examining, < ἐλέγγω, disgrace, put to shame, cross-examine for the purpose of refuting, put to the proof, confute, refute.] In logic, an argumentation concluding the falsity of something maintained; a refutation; a confutation; also, a false refutation; a sophism. Also elenchus.

Reprehension or elench is a syllogism which gathereth a conclusion contrary to the assertion of the respondent.

Blunderbelle (1860).

The sophistical elenchus or refutation, being a delusive semblance of refutation which imposes on ordinary men and induces the latter to accept it as real, cannot be properly understood without the theory of elenchus in general, nor can this last be understood without the entire theory of the syllogism, since the elenchus is only one variety of syllogism. The elenchus is a syllogism with a conclusion contradictory to or refutative of some enunciated thesis or proposition. Accordingly we must understand the conditions of a good and valid syllogism before we study those of a valid elenchus; these last, again, must be understood, before we enter on the distinctive attributes of the pseudo-elenchus—the sophistical, invalid, or sham, refutation. Grote.

Ignorance of the elench. See fallacy of irrelevant conclusion, under fallacy.

elenchic, elenchical (ē-leng'kik, -ki-kal), a. [< elench + -ic, -ical.] Pertaining to or of the nature of an elench; refuting; confutative; sophistical. Bailey, 1776.

elenchically (ē-leng'ki-kal-i), adv. By means of an elench. Imp. Dict.

elenchize (ē-leng'kiz), v. i. [< Gr. ἐλέγχειν, confute, + -ize.] To dispute; refute.

Tip—Hear him problematize.

Pro. Elenchus, what's that?

Tip—Or syllogize, elenchize. B. Jonson, New Inn, II. 2.

elenchtic, elenchtical, a. Erroneous forms of elenchic, elenchical.

elenchus (ē-leng'kus), n. 1. Same as elench. —2. [cap.] [NL.] (a) A genus of gastropods. Humphreys, 1797. (b) A genus of Strepsiptera. Curtis, 1831.

elenctic, elenctical (ē-leng'kik, -ti-kal), a. [Also written, erroneously, elenctic, -al, < Gr. ἐλεγκτικός, refutative, < ἐλέγχειν, verbal adj. of ἐλέγγω, refute, confute; see elench.] Same as elenchic.

elenge, ellenge, a. [Now only dial.; < ME. elenge, also, less often, elynge, eling; perhaps an alteration, with suffix -ing, of AS. ellende, elende, with equiv. ellendise, ME. elenddis, elenddisse, elenddis, -isse, foreign, strange, living in a foreign land (eleland, a foreign land), = OS. elendi = D. ellendig = OHG. elient, for-

The same development of sense appears in wretched, ult. < AS. wrecca, an outcast, exile.] Cheerless; wretched; miserable; unhappy.

Heuy-chered I gede, and elynge in herte.

Piers Plowman (B), xx. 2.

Poverty is this, although it seme elenge,

Possessoun that no wight wil challenge

Chaucer, Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 344.

elengelyt, adv. [ME., also elengelyk; < elenge + -lyt.] Cheerlessly; miserably.

Alimaundre that al wan elengelyk ended.

Piers Plowman (B), xli. 45.

elengenesset, ellengnesset, n. [Early mod. E. elengness; < ME. ellengnesset.] Sorrow; trouble. Rom. of the Rose.

Eleocharis (el-ē-ok'a-ris), n. [NL., prop. Heleocharis*, < Gr. ἑλεος (gen. ἑλεος), low ground by rivers, marsh-meadows, + χαίρα, rejoice, > χαίρω, favor, delight.] A genus of cyperaceous plants, of about 80 species, growing in wet places, and distributed over all tropical and temperate regions. They are characterized by terete or angular culms closely sheathed at the base, and bearing a naked, solitary terminal head of closely imbricated scales. There are about 20 North American species. Commonly known as spike rush.

Eleotragus (el-ē-ot'rā-gus), n. [NL. (J. E. Gray, 1846), prop. Helcotragus*, < Gr. ἑλεος (gen. ἑλεος), a marsh, + τράγος, a goat.] A genus of antelopes, containing such as the riet-bok or reed-buck of South Africa, E. arundinaceus.

Eleotridinae (el-ē-ot-ri-dī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Eleotris (-rid-) + -inae.] A subfamily of gobioid fishes closely resembling the Gobiinae, but with separated ventral fins. Also Eleotrinae.

Eleotris (el-ē-ot-ri-sis), n. [NL. (Gronovius).] A genus of fishes, typical of the subfamily Eleotridinae.

elephant (el'e-fant), n. [*< ME. elefant, elefant, earlier and more commonly olifant, olifant, olifant, olifant, olifant, olifant (rarely, in later ME., spelled with ph, as in L.), < OF. olifant, also elefant, F. éléphant = Pr. elephant = Sp. elefante = Pg. elefante, elephante = It. elefante = AS. elepant, elp, ylp, an elephant (see alp). = MD. tinae, and comprehending two living species, namely, Elephas indicus and Elephas (Loxodon) africanus. The former inhabits India, and is characterized by a concave high forehead, small ears, and comparatively small tusks; the latter is found in Africa, and has a convex forehead, great flapping ears, and large tusks. The tusks occur in both sexes, curving upward from the extremity of the upper jaw. The nose is prolonged into a cylindrical trunk or proboscis, at the extremity of which the nostrils open. The trunk is extremely flexible and highly sensitive, and terminates in a finger-like prehensile were also celebrated in other parts of Greece and Greek lands. See Eleusinion. - Great Eleusinia, the chief annual festival in honor of Demeter and Cora, celebrated at Athens and Eleusis from the 13th to the 23d of Boedromion (September-October). - Lesser Eleusinia, an annual festival at Athens, held as a prelude to the Great Eleusinia in the middle of the month of Anthesterion (February-March).

Eleutheropomii (e-lu'the-rō-pō-mi), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. Ἐλευθερός, free, + πόμψ, a lid.] A suborder of chondropterygian fishes, in which the gills are free. The sturgeons and chimæras were grouped together by Duméril under this title. [Not in use.]

eleutherosepalous (e-lu'the-rō-sep'a-lus), a. [< Gr. Ἐλευθερός, free, + NL. sepalum, sepal, + -ous.] In bot., composed of distinct sepals; polysepalous.

Eleutherurus (e-lu'the-rō-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. Ἐλευθερός, free, + ουρά, tail.] A genus of fruit-eating bats, of the family Pteropodidae, so called ed from having the tail free from the intermembral membrane. E. agyptiacus is a species frequently sculptured on Egyptian monuments.

elevate (el'e-vat), v. t.; pret. and pp. elevated, ppr. elevating. [< L. elevatus, pp. of elevare (< It. elevare = Sp. elevar = F. élever), raise, lift up, < e, ex, out, + levare, make light, lift, < levis, light: see levity, lever. Cf. alterate.] 1. To move or cause to move from a lower to a higher level, place, or position; raise; lift; lift up; as, to elevate the host in the service of the mass; to elevate the voice.

Dwarf, bear my shield; squire, elevate my lance.
Beau and Fl., Knight of Burning Pestle, III. 2

In every endeavour to elevate ourselves above reason, we are seeking to elevate ourselves above the atmosphere with wings which cannot soar but by beating the air.

J. Martineau

You remember the highest stool on which culprits used to be elevated with the tall paper foolscap on their heads, blushing to the core.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 241

2. To raise to a higher state or station; exalt; raise from a low, common, or primary state, as by training or education; raise from or above low conceptions: as, to elevate a man to an office; to elevate the character.

Honours that tended to elevate a body of people into a distinct species from the rest of the nation. Shenstone

A grandeur, a simplicity, a breadth of manner, an imagination at once elevated and restrained by the subject, reign throughout Milton's Ode on the Nativity.

Hallam, Introd. lat. of Europe, III. 5

The competence of man to elevate and to be elevated is in that desire and power to stand in joyful and ennobling intercourse with individuals, which makes the faith and the practice of all reasonable men. Emerson, Domestic Life.

3. To excite; cheer; animate: as, to elevate the spirits.

Nor, Or art thou mad?

Clarion.

With the assurance of my future fortune:

Why do you stare and grieve?

Mansueto, Parliament of Love, II. 1.

When men take pleasure in feeding their minds elevated by strong drink, and so induce their appetites to destroy their understandings, . . . their case is much to be pitied.

John Woodman, Journal (1750), p. 93.

Hence—4. To intoxicate slightly; render somewhat tipsy. [Colloq.]

His depth of feeling is misunderstood; he is supposed to be a little elevated, and nobody heeds him.

Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit, IV.

5. To make light or unimportant; diminish the weight or importance of.

The Arabian physicians, . . . not being able to deny it to be true of the holy Jesus, endeavour to elevate and lessen the thing by saying it is not wholly beyond the force of nature that a virgin should conceive.

J. Taylor, Rule of Conscience, I. 4.

disclosed elevated. See disclosed. - Elevated railroad. See railroad. - Elevating arc. See arc. - Syn. 1. To lift up, uplift. 2. To promote, ennoble. - 1-3. Lift, raise, etc. See raise.

elevatio (el'e-vā-tiō), n. [ME. elevari; < L. elevatus, pp.; see the verb.] Raised; elevated. [Poetical and rare.]

And in a reach elevate and high,
And by the form wherein it [a comet] did appear,
As to most skillful accurately divine
Foreshow'd a kingdom shortly to decline.

Drayton, Baron's Wars, I.

On each side an imperial city stood,
With towers and temples proudly elevate
On seven small hills.

Milton, P. R., IV. 34.

elevatedness (el'e-vā-ted-nēs), n. The state of being elevated.

I had neither wife nor children, in whom mutually to reflect and see reflected the elevatedness and generosity of my action.

Geddes, St. Leon.

elevating-screw (el'e-vā-ting-skru), n. A screw by means of which the breech of a piece of ordnance is adjusted for the elevation or vertical direction of the piece.

Egyptian Free-tailed Bat (E. agyptiacus)

elevatio (el'e-vā-tiō), n. [L.: see elevation.]

1. In anc. music, a raising of the voice; arsis. - 2. In medieval music, the extension of a mode beyond its usual compass or ambitus.

elevation (el'e-vā'shon), n. [< ME. elevarioun, < OF. elevarioun, F. élévation = Fr. élévation. elevatio = Sp. elevación = Pg. elevação = It. elevazione, < L. elevation (n.), a lifting up, < elevare, lift up, elevare: see elevate.] 1. The act of elevating or raising from a lower level, place, or position to a higher.

I hope a proper elevation of voice, a due emphasis and accent, are not to come within this description.

Steele, Spectator, No. 147.

I can add nothing to the accounts already published of the elevation of the land at Valparaiso which accompanied the earthquake of 1822.

Darwin, Geol. Observations II. 245.

2. The state of being raised or elevated; exaltation; specifically, exaltation of feeling or spirits.

Different elevations of spirit unto God are contained in the name of prayer.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 48.

His style was an elegant perspicuity, rich of phrase, but seldom any bold metaphors; and so far from tumid, that it rather wanted a little elevation.

Sir H. Wotton.

I fancied I could distinguish an elevation of spirit different from that which is the cause or the effect of simple jollity.

Sterne, Sentimental Journey, p. 116.

Hence—3. A state of slight inebriation; tipsiness. [Colloq.]—4. That which is raised or elevated; an elevated place; a rising ground; a height.

His [Milton's] poetry reminds us of the miracles of Alpine scenery. Rocks and dells, beautiful as fairyland, are embosomed in its most rugged and gigantic elevations.

Macaulay, Milton.

5. Altitude. (a) In astron., the distance of a heavenly body above the horizon, or the arc of a vertical circle intercepted between it and the horizon. (b) In gunn., the angle which the axis of the bore makes with the plane of the horizon. (c) In diapic., the angle which the style makes with the substylar line. (d) In topogr., (1) Height; the vertical distance above the sea level or other surface of reference. (2) The angle at which anything is raised above a horizontal direction.

Take the elevation of the pool, and take the latitude of thy region.

Chaucer, Astrology, II. 623.

6. In arch., a geometrical representation of a building or part of a building or other structure in vertical projection—that is, of its upright parts.—7. Eccles., the act of raising the eucharistic elements after consecration and before communion, in sign of oblation to God, or in order to show them to the people. With reference to the latter purpose especially, this act is also known as the ostension. The act of elevation before God and that of ostension to the people are, however, in many liturgies not coincident.

The priests were shaming, and the organ sounded,
And then anon the great cathedral bell,
It was the elevation of the Host.

Longfellow, Spanish Student, I. 3.

8. In the Rom. Cath. liturgy, a musical composition, vocal or instrumental, performed in connection with the elevation of the host. - Altitude or elevation of the pole. See altitude. - Angle of elevation, in ordnance, the angle which the axis of the gun makes with a line passing through its sights and the target. - Elevation bell. See bell. - Elevation of the panagia. See panagia. - Geometric elevation, a design for the front or side of a building drawn according to the rules of geometry, as opposed to perspective or natural elevation. - Syn. 1. Lifting, lifting up, uplifting, improvement. 2. Eminence, loftiness, superiority, refinement.

elevator (el'e-vā-tor), n. [= F. élevateur = Sp. elevador = It. elevatore, < LL. elevar], one who raises up, a deliverer, < L. elevar, lift up; see elevate.] 1. One who or that which raises, lifts, or exalts. Specifically—2. In anat.: (a) A muscle which raises a part of the body, as the lip or eyelid: same as levator. (b) Same as extensor. [Rare.]

There appear, at first, to be but three elevators, or extensors [of the digit], but practically each segment [phalanx] has its elevator.

Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 50.

3. A surgical instrument used for raising a depressed or fractured part of the skull. Also called elevari.—4. In mech., a hoisting apparatus: a lift. (a) A car or cage for lifting and lowering passengers or freight in a hoistway: in a broad sense, the entire hoisting apparatus, including the shaft or well, the cage, and the motor. See hoisting-engine.

(b) A structure for storing grain in bulk including the grain-lifters and conveyers. In such elevators the elevator proper, or lifter, is a continuous band of leather studded with metal cups or elevator-buckets, passing over a pulley at the top of the building and under a second pulley on the elevator-belt, or the foot of an inclined tube called the elevator-lee (see lee). In some instances the elevator-lee is pivoted at the top, so that it may swing clear of the building and reach into the hold of the vessel or car to be emptied. The structure itself consists of a nest of deep bins, into which the grain is directed by spouts from the top of the lifter. The capacity of such elevators is often one and a half million bushels or more. For the horizontal movement of grain in elevators, conveyers are used. Lifting elevators are also used in flour-mills, grinding-mills, furnaces, and other works, to handle materials of all kinds in bulk, as sand, ashes, ice, etc.

5. A building containing one or more mechanical elevators, especially a warehouse for the storage of grain. [U. S.]—Autodynamic elevator. See autodynamic.—Elevator case, a noted case before the United States Supreme Court in 1876 (Munn vs. Illinois, 94 U. S., 113), in which it was decided that, notwithstanding the exclusive power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, a State may, for the public good, regulate the manner in which citizens shall use their property when devoted by them to a use in which the public have an interest: so called because sustaining the validity of a statute limiting grain elevator tolls.—Elevator engine. See engine.—Floating elevator, an elevator erected on a boat for lifting, transferring, or storing grain. Such elevators are used to transfer grain from barges to the holds of ships.—Hydraulic elevator, an elevator operated by some kind of hydraulic apparatus. For short lifts the hydraulic press is sometimes used, particularly where the weight to be raised is great. Another form, for light loads and moderate heights, is a telescopic tube supporting the car at the upper end. On filling the tube with water under pressure it expands and raises the car; to lower it, the supply of water is cut off, and that in the tube is allowed to escape. The most common form of hydraulic elevator in the United States is that of a car lifted by ropes, operated by a piston in a long cylinder. The rope is connected directly with the piston rod, which is moved by the admission of water under pressure. In some instances the cylinder is horizontal and the travel of the piston limited, multiplying gear being fitted to the rope. The usual form is an upright cylinder with a very simple form of rope-gearing. Pneumatic elevator, a hoisting or lifting apparatus worked by compressed air, a pneumatic hoist.

elevatory (ē-lev'ō-ri), a. and n. [= F. élevatoire = It. elevatorio, < NL. elevatorius*, < L. elevar, elevar, elevar; see elate.] I. a. Raising or tending to raise; having power to elevate.

Channels are almost universally present within the fringing reefs of those islands which have undergone recent elevatory movements. Darwin, Coral Reefs, p. 73.

Among the elevatory and the ecoreparative agents, the most important place must be assigned to earthquakes and volcanoes. Huxley, Physiology, p. 186.

II. n.; pl. elevatories (-rīz). Same as elevator, 3.

élève (ā-lev'), n. [F., < élever, raise, bring up, educate, < L. elevar, raise; see elate.] A pupil; one brought up, educated, or trained by another.

eleven (ē-lev'n), a. and n. [< ME. ellevēn, enlevēn, enlevēn, enlevēn, enlevēn, enlevēn, etc., < AS. endelefan, endelefan, endelefan (= OS. elef, elefan, elefan, elefan = OFries. andlofta, alvene, elleva = D. elf = LG. elfe, elfe, elfen = OHG. enlf, enlf, enlf, enlf, enlf, enlf, enlf, enlf = feel. elufa, later elufa = Sw. elva = Dan. elleva = Goth. enlf), eleven, orig. enlf* (the first syllable (enlf, < an) having been modified by shortening and mutation with dissimilated gemination of n to nd, and the last syllable (-an, -on) added as a quasi-plural suffix), < an (Goth. an, etc.), one, -lf*, an element appearing also in Goth. twelf = AS. twelf, twelf, twelf, etc. (see twelve), and appar. = Lith. lika, in venlika, eleven, where the element is by some supposed to stand for dika* = Gr. deka = L. decem = E. ten, making the Teut. and Lith. forms exactly cognate with L. undecim, eleven, < unus = E. one, + decem = E. ten.] I. a. One more than ten; a cardinal numeral beginning the second decade: as, eleven men.

The game (showed board), when two play, is generally eleven; but the number is extended when four or more are jointly concerned. Scott, Sports and Pastimes, p. 29.

II. n. 1. The number which is the sum of ten and one.—2. A symbol representing eleven units, as 11, or XI, or xi.—3. A team or side in cricket or foot-ball: so called because regularly consisting of eleven players: as, the Philadelphia eleven; there were two strong elevens matched.

eleven-o'clock-lady (ē-lev'n-ō-klok-lā'di), n. [Tr. F. dame d'once heures.] The star-of-Bethlehem, Ornithogalum umbellatum.

eleventh (ē-lev'nth), a. and n. [< ME. ellevēnth, ellevēnth, ellevēnth, ellevēnth, ellevēnth, etc., < AS. endelftha (= OS. elifta = OFries. ellefta, ellefta, ellefta, ellefta = D. elfde = OHG. enlfta, enlfta, enlfta, enlfta, enlfta, enlfta, enlfta, enlfta = feel. elifta, mod. elifta = Dan. ellevte = Sw. elfte, eleventh: as eleven (AS. endelefan, etc.) + -th, the ordinal suffix: see -th.] I. a. 1. Next in order after the tenth: an ordinal number.

But about the eleventh hour he went out and founde other stoudfuge, and he seide to hem, what stoudfuge ye had here at dat? Wyclif, Mat. xx.

2. Constituting one of eleven equal parts into which anything is divided: as, the eleventh part of fifty-five is five.—At the eleventh hour, at the last moment; just before it is too late: in allusion to the parable of the laborers in the vineyard. Mat. xx. 1-16.

II. n. 1. One of eleven equal parts; the quotient of unity divided by eleven: as, five elevenths of fifty-five are twenty-five.

The cryopraxe the tenth is to get;
The lacyngh the eleventh the gent.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), l. 1013.

2. In early Eng. law, an eleventh part of the rents of the year, or of movables, or both, granted or levied by way of tax.—3. In music: (a) The interval between any tone and a tone on the eleventh diatonic degree above or below it; a compound fourth, or an octave and a fourth. (b) A tone distant by an eleventh from a given tone.

elf (elf), n.; pl. elves (elvz). [Early mod. E. also elfe; < ME. elf, elfe, elfe, pl. elven, elvene, < AS. ælf, pl. ylfe, m. ælfen, ælfen, in a very early form albin (usually in comp.), m. an elf, sprite, fairy, incubus, = MD. alf, D. elf = MHG. alf, LG. elf = OHG. alp, MHG. alp, alp, pl. elbe, and G. alp, m., MHG. elbe, f. See elking.] 1. An imaginary being superstitiously supposed to inhabit frequented places, and in various ways to affect mankind; a sprite; a fairy; a goblin. Elves are usually imagined as diminutive, tricky beings in human form, given to capricious interference, either kindly or mischievous, in human affairs.

This was the olde opinion as I rede,
I speke of many hundred yeres ago
But now kan no man se none elves no
Chaucer, Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 6.

Every elf and fairy sprite
Hop as light as birds from brier Shak., M. N. D., v. 1.

The elven chace,
Whose little eyes glow
Like the sparks of fire, befriended thee
Herrick, Night Piece to Julia.

2. A mischievous or wicked person; a knave, a rogue.

Had him, without more ado
Surrender himself or else the proud elf Shall suffer with all his crew
Robin Hood and the Valiant Knight (Child's Ballads, IV, 350).

Spite of all the rithing elven,
Those who would make us free must feel themselves free
Chaucer, The Boecial, l. 1961.

3. A diminutive person; a dwarf; hence, a pet name for a child, especially one who is very sprightly and graceful. Syn. 1. Sprits, hobgoblins, imps. 2. Uchun, dwarf. 1 and 3. Four, goblin, etc. See elf.

elf (elf), v. t. [< elf, n., in allusion to the mischievousness ascribed to elves. Cf. elf-lock.] To entangle intricately, as the hair. [Rare.]

elfin (elf'īn), n. and a. [An artificial (poetical) form, first used by Spenser; in form as if an adj. (for elfen*, < elf + -en), but it first appears as a noun, and in act. 2 is appar. regarded as diminutive. Cf. AS. ælfen, ælfen, ælfen (usually in comp.), = MHG. elven, a fairy, nymph, fem. of elf, an elf; see elf.] I. n. 1. An elf; an inhabitant of fairy-land: in Spenser applied to his knights.

He was an elfin borne of noble state
And hardly worthy in his native land
Spenser, F. Q., II, 6.

2. A little urchin or child. [Playful.]

For she was just and kind to every one,
And pass'd much time in truly virtuous deed;
And in these elfin ways would oft be play
The times, when truth by Popish rage did bleed Shelton, The Schoolmistress, st. 17.

= Syn. See fairy, n.

II. a. Relating or pertaining to elves.

The mightiest chiefs of British song
Scorned not such legends to profess:
They gleam through Spenser's elfin dream,
And mix in Milton's heavenly theme Scott, Marion, Ind., l.

Excalbur, . . . rich
With jewels, elfin Urim, on the hill.
Tennyson, Coming of Arthur.

Chaucer, Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 4.

elf-shot (elf'shot), a. Shot by an elf.

There, every bird by sad experience, knowes
How, wing'd with fate, their elf-shot arrows fly,
When the sick cow her summer food foregoes,
Or, stretched on earth, the heart smit in her lie.
Collier, Pop. Superstitions of the Highlands.

elf-shot (elf'shot), n. 1. Same as elf-bolt.

The Stone Arrow Heads of the old inhabitants of this Island (that are sometimes found) are vulgarly supposed to be Weapons shot by Fairies at Cattle. They are called Elf-shots.
Bacon's Pop. Antiq. (1777), p. 147, note.

2. A disease supposed to be produced by the agency of elves. [Scotch.]

elf-skin (elf'skin), n. A word found only in the following passage, where it is probably a misprint for elf-skin (in allusion to Prince Henry's long and lank figure).

Far Away you starveling, you elf-skin, you dried neat's-tongue Shak., I Hen. IV., II, 4.

elf-stone (elf'ston), n. Same as elf-bolt.

elger (el'ger), n. [D. elger, < ME. elger, elger (= MD. aelger, aelger, D. aelger), ult. < AS. æl, col, + gar, spear; see gar, gar.] An ael-spear. Prompt. Par., p. 138. [Local, Eng.]

Elgin marbles. See marble.

Elia (ē-lī-ah), a. Pertaining to Elis, an ancient city of the Greek Peloponnese. Also Elia.

Elia school, a school of philosophy founded in Elis by Plato, a school and favorite of Aristotle. Its doctrines are conjectured to have been ethical, and somewhat skeptical concerning the theory of cognition.

elicit (ē-lī't), v. t. [< L. elicitus, pp. of elice, draw out, < e, out, + lucere, entice; see luc. Cf. ellect.] To draw out; bring forth or to light; evolve; gain: as, to elicit sparks by coltion; to elicit truth by discussion; to elicit approval.

From the words taken together such a sense must be elicited as will give a meaning to each word.

Lucan, Advancement of Learning, II. 254.

That may justly elicit the assent of reasonable men.

Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 129.

It is not the composition of the piece, but the number of starts and attitudes that may be introduced, that elicits applause.

Goldsmith, Vicar, xviii.

The inquiry at Stratham was calculated to elicit the truth.

D. Webster, Goodrich Case, April, 1837.

elicit (ē-lis'it), a. [L. elictus, pp.: see the verb.] 1. Immediately directed to an end; opposed to imperate.

To give alms is a proper and elicit act of charity.

Jer. Taylor, Rule of Conscience, II. 3.

2. Performed by the will itself without the aid of any other faculty: as, volition, notion, choice, consent, and the like are elicit acts: opposed to imperate.

The schools dispute whether in morals the external action superadds anything of good or evil to the internal elicit act of the will.

South, Works, I. 3.

elicitate (ē-lis'i-tāt), v. t. [L. elicit + -ate.] To elicit.

And make it strene with light from forms lunate.

Thus may a skilful man bid truth elicitate.

Dr. H. More, Sleep of the Soul, II. 41.

elicitation (ē-lis-i-tā'shon), n. [L. elicitate + -ion.] The act of eliciting, or of drawing out.

That elicitation which the schools intend is a deducting of the power of the will into act; that drawing which they mention is merely from the appetibility of the object.

Rp. Bramhall.

elide (ē-lid'), v. t.; pret. and pp. elided, ppr. eliding. [= Sp. Pg. elidir = It. elidere, < L. elidere, knock, strike, or dash out, force out, press out, in gram. (tr. Gr. ekthizein: see ekthipsis) suppress (a vowel), < e, out, + ludere, strike, hurt by striking: see lesion. Cf. collide.] 1. To break or dash in pieces; crush.

Before we answer into these things, we are to cut off that whereunto they from whom these objections proceed do often times fly for defence and succour, when the force and strength of their arguments is elided.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, IV. 4.

2. In gram., to suppress or slur over the sound of in speech, or note the suppression of in writing: technically applied especially to the cutting off of a final vowel, as in "th' enemy," but in a more general sense to that of a syllable or any part of a word. See elision, 1.

eligibility (el-i-jib'il-i-ti), n. [L. eligibilis: see -bility.] 1. Worthiness or fitness to be chosen; the state or quality of a thing which renders it desirable or preferable to another.

Sickness hath some degrees of eligibility, at least by an after choice.

Jer. Taylor, Holy Dying, vi. § 3.

2. Capability of being chosen to an office; the condition of being qualified to be chosen; legal qualification for election or appointment.

eligible (el-i-jib'l), a. and n. [OF. eligible, F. eligible = It. eligibile, < ML. eligibilis*, that may be chosen (in adv. compar. eligibilis), < L. eligere, choose: see elect.] 1. a. Fit to be chosen; worthy of choice; desirable: as, an eligible tenant.

Peace with man can never be eligible when it implies enmity with God.

Rp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. xxiv.

While health endures, the latter part of life, in the eye of reason, is certainly the more eligible.

Steele, Spectator, No. 143.

Certainty, in a deep distress, is more eligible than a response.

Richardson, Charles, Barlowe.

Through tomes of fable and of dream

I sought an eligible theme

Conquer, Annus Memorialis, 1780.

2. Qualified to be chosen; legally qualified for election or appointment.

Among the Mundinians, the possession of ten smoked-dried heads of enemies renders a man eligible to the rank of chief.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 330.

II. n. One who is qualified to be chosen or elected; an eligible person.

The certification of all the eligibles will result in what you have applauded.

The American, XII. 172.

eligibleness (el-i-jib'l-nes), n. The state of being eligible; fitness to be chosen in preference to another; suitability; desirableness.

It [citizenship] embraced certain private rights, and certain political rights, these last being principally the right of suffrage, and eligibleness to office.

G. P. Fisher, Begins of Christianity, p. 10.

eligibly (el-i-jib'l), adv. In an eligible manner; so as to be worthy of choice or capable of election.

eligmid (ē-lig'mid), n. A bivalve mollusk of the family Eligmodidae.

Eligmodidae (ē-lig'mi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Eligmus + -idae.] A family of fossil bivalve mollusks, typified by the genus Eligmus. They have a peculiar shell gaping behind the umbones and a special myophore for the adductor muscle. The species are peculiar to the Cretaceous. They are generally referred to the family Cardiidae.

Eligmus (ē-lig'mus), n. [NL., prop. Heligmus*, < Gr. ἑλγμός, a winding, rolling, convulsion, < ἑλγναι, wind, roll, turn: see helix.] The typical genus of Eligmodidae.

elimater (el-i-māt or ē-lim'āt), v. t. [L. elimatus, pp. of elimare, file, polish, < e, out, + limare, file, < lima, a file.] To render smooth; polish.

eliminable (ē-lim'i-nā-bl), a. [L. eliminare, eliminate: see -able.] Capable of being eliminated.

Cumulative error, not eliminable by working in a circuit, may be caused when there is much nothing or nothing in the direction of the line.

Knappe, Brit., XIII. 707.

eliminant (ē-lim'i-nant), n. [L. eliminant(-)s, ppr. of eliminare, turn out of doors: see eliminate.] In math., a function of the coefficients of any number of homogeneous equations among the same number of unknown quantities, such that the vanishing of it is the necessary and sufficient condition of the equations being consistent with one another. [The word was introduced by De Morgan. Many writers continue to use Bezout's word, resultant.]

eliminate (ē-lim'i-nāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. eliminated, ppr. eliminating. [L. eliminatus, pp. of eliminare (> It. eliminare = Sp. Pg. eliminar = F. eliminer), turn out of doors, banish, < e, out, + limen (limin-), a threshold, akin to limit (< limen), a boundary: see limit.] 1. To go beyond the limit or limits of.

In thy wretched clouster thou Walkedst thine own grey filar too;
Strick and lock'd up, thou'lt hoard all o'er,
And ne'er eliminat'st thy door.

Longue, The Small.

2. To thrust out; remove, throw aside, or disregard as injurious, superfluous, irrelevant, or for any reason undesirable or unnecessary; expel; get rid of.

This detains secretions which nature finds it necessary to eliminate.

Med. Repert.

Now here the obvious method occurs of sifting the masses, so as to eliminate the worst elements and retain the best.

Prof. Blacke.

Scientific truths, of whatever order, are reached by eliminating perturbing or conflicting factors, and recognizing only fundamental factors.

H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 104.

3. In math., to remove (a quantity) from a system of equations by the reduction of the number of equations. Thus, if we have two equations expressing respectively the rates at which an orange grows, on a tree increases in bulk and in weight, we can combine them so as to eliminate the time, and so obtain an equation expressing the relation between the bulk and the weight.

To eliminate the personal equation. [The use of eliminate as a synonym of check, deduce, separate, etc., practised by some writers, is without justification.

Newton, . . . having eliminated the great law of the natural condition.

J. D. Morrell.

To eliminate the real effect of art from the effects of the senses.

Ruskin.

elimination (ē-lim-i-nā'shon), n. [= F. Élimination = Sp. eliminación = Pg. eliminação = It. eliminazione, < L. as if eliminatio(n)-*, < eliminare, thrust out of doors: see eliminate.] 1. A thrusting out; the act of removing, throwing aside, or disregarding; expulsion; riddance.

The preparatory step of the discussion was, therefore, an elimination of those less precise and appropriate significations which, as they would at best only afford a remotely genus and difference, were wholly incompetent for the purpose of a definition.

Sir W. Hamilton.

By means of researches on different coloured light it is now ascertained that those rays which cause the liveliest stimulation of oxygen belong to the less refrangible half of the spectrum.

Lommel, Light (trans.), p. 130.

2. In law, the act of banishing or turning out of doors; ejection. — 3. In math., the process of reducing a number of equations containing certain quantities to a smaller number, in which one or more of the quantities shall not be found. Dialytic elimination. See dialytic. — Euler's method of elimination. A method of eliminating an unknown quantity between two equations of the *m*th and *n*th degrees respectively, which consists in multiplying the first by an indeterminate expression of the *(n-m)*th degree and the second by an indeterminate expression of the *(m-1)*th degree, and equating separately the m + 1 terms so obtained. The determinant expressing their compatibility is the eliminant required.

eliminative (ē-lim'i-nā-tiv), a. [L. eliminare + -ive.] Pertaining to or effecting elimination; specifically, excretory.

Eliminatives or excretory tissues represented by cells in the kidneys, skin, etc.

H. N. Martin, Human Body (2d ed.), p. 20.

eliminator (ē-lim'i-nā-tor), n. [L. eliminare + -or.] One who or that which eliminates, removes, or throws aside.

The lungs play a double part, being not merely eliminators of waste or excretory products, but importers into the economy of a substance which is not exactly either food or drink, but something as important as either — to wit, oxygen.

Huxley and Yountman, Physiol., § 22.

eliminatory (ē-lim'i-nā-tō-ri), a. [L. eliminare + -ory.] Eliminative.

Chronic irritation set up in the eliminatory organs by the excretion of incompletely oxidized nitrogenous matter.

Med. News, LII. 394.

elinguat (ē-ling'gwāt), v. t. [L. elinguatus, pp. of elinguare, deprive of the tongue, < e, out, + lingua = E. tongue.] To cut out the tongue of.

The damned Doomes-man bath Him ju'd'd to death,
The Du'll that Du'll elinguat for his doome.

Darwin, Holy Roode, p. 14.

elinguation (ē-ling-gwā'shon), n. [L. elinguatio(n)-, < L. elinguare, deprive of the tongue: see elinguat.] In old Eng. law, the punishment of cutting out the tongue.

elinguist (ē-ling'gwīd), a. [With irreg. term. -ist, < L. elinguis, without a tongue, speechless, < e, out, + lingua = E. tongue.] Tongue-tied; not having the power of speech. Colea.

Elomys (ē-lī'ō-mis), n. [NL. (Wagner, 1843), < Gr. ἑλμός or ἑλμός, a kind of dormouse, Myomys glis, + mis, mouse.] A genus of dormice, of the family Myoxidae, with distichous tufted tail and simple stomach. There are several species, the best-known of which, E. nitela, is the lerot, about 6 inches long.

eliquament (ē-lik'wā-ment), n. [LL. as if eliquamentum*, < eliquare, clarify, strain: see eliquate.] A liquid expressed from fat, or from fat fish.

eliquate (el-i-kwāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. eliquated, ppr. eliquating. [L. eliquatus, pp. of eliquare, cause to flow, pour forth, clarify, strain, < L. e, out, + liquare, melt, liquefy: see liquate.] To separate, as one metal from another. See liquate.

eliquation (el-i-kwā'shon), n. [LL. eliquatio(n)-, a liquefying, < eliquare, cause to flow freely, pour forth, clarify, strain: see eliquate.] See liquation.

Ellis (ē-lis), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1804).] A genus of fossorial hymenopterous insects, of the family Scelididae. The eyes are subreniform in both sexes, and the front wings have two recurrent nervures.

Ellis quadricolor, natural size.

They are large wasps of scoldish habits, of which 9 North American and 6 European species are known. E. quadricolor and E. plumipes inhabit the southern United States, where they have been found on cotton-plants.

elision (ē-liz'hon), n. [= F. élision = Sp. elisión = Pg. elisão = It. elisione, elision, < L. elisio(n)-, a striking or pressing out, in gram. (LL.) the suppression of a vowel (tr. Gr. ekthipsis: see ekthipsis), < elidere, pp. elisis, strike out, press out: see elide.] 1. A striking or cutting off; specifically, in gram., the cutting off or suppression of a vowel or syllable, naturally or for the sake of euphony or meter, especially at the end of a word when the next word begins with a vowel; more generally, the suppression of any part of a word in speech or writing: as, in "th' embattled plain" there is an elision of e; in "I'll not do it" there is an elision of ri.

The Italian is so full of Vowels, that it must ever be cumbered with Elisions. Sir P. Sidney, Apol. for Poetrie.

elna, elna, MHG. eline, elno, ellen, G. elle = Icel. elin = Sw. alu = Dan. alen = Goth. aleina (for aluna?), an ell, whence It. auna, F. aune, an ell; orig. the forearm (as in AS. eln-baga, E. elbow), = L. ulna, the forearm, the elbow, an ell, = Gr. ulnē, the forearm: see elbow, ulna.] A long measure, chiefly used for cloth. The English ell, not yet obsolete, is a yard and a quarter, or 45 inches. This unit seems to have been imported from France under the Tudors; and a statute of 1569 recognizes no difference between the ell (aune) and the yard (verge). The Scotch ell was 37 Scotch inches, or 31.665 English inches. The so-called Flemish ell differed in different places, but averaged 27.4 English inches. Other well ascertained ells were the following: ell of Austria, 30.676 English inches; of Bavaria, 32.702 inches; of Bremen, 25.773 inches; of Cassel, 22.421 inches; of France, 47.245 inches; of Poland, 22.850 inches; of Prussia, 26.259 inches; of Saxony, 22.557 inches; of Sweden, 21.374 inches. The ell of Holland is now the meter. See elbit, pk, endazh, kul, braccio, khaleh.

He was, I must tell you, but seven foot high,
And, may be, an ell in the waste.
Robin Hood and Little John (Child's Ballads, V. 221).
O, here's a wit of cheverel that stretches from an inch narrow to an ell broad! Shak, R. and J. II. 4.
She [the world] boasts a kernel, and bestows a shell;
Performs an inch of her fair promised ell.
Quarles, Emblems, I. 7.

ell², el² (el), n. [*< ME. el, < AS. el, < L. el, the name of the letter l, < e, the usual assistant vowel, + -l; a l formation, the Gr. name being ἐλλήδα.] 1. The name of the letter l. It is rarely so written, the symbol being used instead.—2. An addition to or wing of a house which gives it the shape of the capital letter l.—3. A pipe-connection changing the direction at right angles.

ellachick (el'g-chuk), n. [Nesqually Ind. el-lachick.] A tortoise of the family Clemmydidae, Chelopus marmoratus. It is usually about 7 or 8 inches long, and is the most important economic tortoise of the Pacific coast of the United States; it lives in rivers and ponds, and lays its eggs in June. It is always on sale in the San Francisco market, and is highly esteemed for food, although inferior to the sea turtle.

ellagic (e-laj'ik), a. [*< ellig, an arbitrary transposition of F. galle, gall, + -ic.] Pertaining to or derived from gallnuts. Ellagic acid, C₁₀H₆O₆, an acid which may be prepared from gallic acid, but is procured in largest quantities from the Oriental berrys. Pure ellagic acid is a light, pale yellow, tasteless powder, shown by the microscope to consist of transparent plates. With the bases it forms salts. Also called benzoic acid.

ell-bone (el'bōn), n. [*< ell¹ (taken in its orig. sense, AS. eln = L. ulna) + bone¹*. Cf. elbow.] The bone of the forearm; the ulna.

ellebore, n. An obsolete variant of hellebore. Chaucer.

elleborin (el'g-bō-rin), n. [< L. elleborus, helleborus, + -in; see hellebore.] A resin of an extremely acrid taste, found in the Helleborus niger, or winter hellebore.

ellock (el'ek), n. [E. dial.; origin unknown. Cf. Elleck, Ellek, Ellek, etc., colloquial abbreviations of Alexander.] A local English name of the red gurnard, Trigla cuculus.

eller¹ (el'ér), n. A dialectal form of *elder*².

eller² (el'ér), n. A dialectal form of *elder*¹.

Ellerian (e-lér-i-an), n. A member of a sect of German Millenarians of the eighteenth century, founded by Elias Eller (died 1750). The Ellerians expected the Messiah to be born again of the wife of their leader, whose professed revelations they accepted as of equal authority with the Bible. From Ellersdorf, the place of their settlement, they are also called Rosenhofians.

ellern, a. A dialectal form of aldern.

elless, adv. A Middle English form of else.

Ellipsochordoid (el'i-pō-kō-a-nōi'da), a. and n. [See Ellipsochordoid.] 1. a. Having incomplete septal funnels; specifically, of or pertaining to the Ellipsochordoid. Also ellipsochordoid.

II. n. A member of the Ellipsochordoida. Ellipsochordoida (el'i-pō-kō-a-nōi'da), n. pl. [NL. < Gr. ἐλλειψος, omitting, falling short (< ἐλλειψω, omit, fall short; see ellipse), + χορδή, a funnel, + -oida.] A group of nautiloid cephalopods whose septal funnels are short, the siphon being completed by means of a more or less porous intervening connective wall; contrasted with Holochordoida. A. Hyatt, Proc. Bost. Soc. Nat. Hist., XXII, 260.

ellipsochordoid (el'i-pō-kō-a-nōi'dal), c. Same as ellipsochordoid.

ellipse (e-lip's), n. [= D. Sw. ellips = G. Dan. ellipse = F. ellipse = Sp. elipse = Pg. elipse = It. ellisse, elisse, ellipse, < L. ellipsis, a want, defect, an ellipse, < Gr. ἐλλειψω, a leaving out, ellipse in grammar, a falling short, the conic section ellipse (see def.). < ἐλλειψω, leave in, leave behind, omit, intr. fall short, < ἐν, in, + λείπω, leave. Cf. ellipsis.] In geom., a plane curve such that the sums of the distances of each point in its periphery from two fixed points, the foci, are equal. It is a conic section (see conic) formed by the intersection of a cone by a plane which cuts obliquely the axis and the opposite sides of the cone. The ellipse is a conic which does not extend to infinity, and whose intersections with the line at infinity are imaginary. Every ellipse has a center, which is a point such that it bisects every chord passing through it. Such chords are called diameters of the ellipse. A pair of conjugate diameters bisect, each of them, all chords parallel to the other. The longest diameter is called the transverse axis, also the latus transversum. It passes through the foci. The shortest diameter is called the conjugate axis. The extremities of the transverse axis are called the vertices. (See conic, eccentricity, angle.) An ellipse may also be regarded as a flattened circle—that is, as a circle all the chords of which parallel to a given chord have been shortened in a fixed ratio by cutting off equal lengths from the two extremities. The two lines from the foci to any point of an ellipse make equal angles with the tangent at that point. To construct any ellipse, assume any line whatever, AB, to be what is called the latus rectum. At its extremity erect the perpendicular AD of any length, called the latus transversum (transverse axis). Connect BD, and complete to the rectangle DABK. From any point L on the line AD, erect the perpendicular LZ, cutting BK in Z and BD in H. Draw a line HG, completing the rectangle ALHG. There are now two points, E and E', on the line LZ such that the square on LE or LE' is equal to the rectangle ALHG. The locus of such points, found by taking L at Ellipse.

F and F' are the foci. L M, M' are any points on the curve. M M' is a chord passing through it. Such chords are called diameters of the ellipse.

different places on the line AD, form an ellipse. [The name ellipse in its Greek form was given to the curve, which had been previously called the section of the acute-angled cone, by Apollonius of Perga, called by the Greeks "the great conic." The participle ἐλλειψω, "falling short," had long been technically applied to a rectangle one of whose sides coincides with a part of a given line (see Euclid, VI. 27). So ἐλλειψω and ὀρθοῦσιν (Euclid, VI. 28, 29) were said of a rectangle whose side extends just as far and overlaps respectively the cone sections by plane constructions, using the latus rectum and latus transversum (transverse axis), as above. The ellipse was so called by him because, since the point L lies between A and D, the rectangle ALHG "falls short" of the latus rectum AB. In the case of the hyperbola L lies either to the left of A or to the right of D, and the rectangle ALHG "overlaps" the latus rectum. In the case of the parabola there is no latus transversum, but the line BK extends to infinity, and the rectangle equal to the square of the ordinate has the latus rectum for one side.] Cubical ellipse. See cubical. Focal ellipse. See focal. Infinite ellipse. Same as ellipse. Logarithmic ellipse, the section of an elliptic cylinder by a parabola. Booth, 1862.

ellipsis (e-lip'sis), n.; pl. ellipses (e-lips'es). [= D. Sw. ellips = G. Dan. ellipse = F. ellipse = Sp. elipse = Pg. elipse = It. elisse, elisse, < L. ellipsis, < Gr. ἐλλειψω, omission, ellipse; see ellipse.] 1. In gram., omission; a figure of syntax by which a part of a sentence or phrase is used for the whole, by the omission of one or more words, leaving the full form to be understood or completed by the reader or hearer: as, "the heroic virtues I admire," for "the heroic virtues which I admire," for "prayer, peace," for "I pray thee, hold thy peace."—2. In printing, a mark or marks, as —, . . . , denoting the omission or suppression of letters (as in k—g for kmg) or of words.—3. In geom., an ellipse.

When a right cone is cut quite through by a inclining plane, the figure produced by the section agrees well with the received notion of an ellipse, in which the diameters are of an unequal length. Boyle, Works, IV, 464.

ellipsograph (e-lip'sō-gráf), n. [Prop. elliptograph; < Gr. ἐλλειψω (< ἐλλειψω), ellipse (see ellipse), + γραφω, I write.] An instrument for describing ellipses; a trammel. Also elliptograph.

ellipsoid (e-lip'soid), n. [< Gr. ἐλλειψω, ellipse, + σφαῖρα, form.] In geom., a solid figure all plane sections of which are ellipses or circles. Axes of an ellipsoid. See axis. Central ellipsoid, an ellipsoid having its center at the center of mass of a body, its axes coincident with the principal axes and proportional to the radii of gyration about them.—Ellipsoid of expansion. See ellipsoid, below.—Ellipsoid of gyration, an ellipsoid such that the perpendicular from its center to any tangent plane is equal to the radius of gyration of a given body about that axis.—Ellipsoid of inertia. Same as ellipsoid of gyration.—Ellipsoid of revolution, the surface generated by the rotation of an ellipse about one of its axes. When the rotation is about the major axis, the ellipsoid is prolate; when about the minor, the ellipsoid is oblate.—Equimomental ellipsoid, an ellipsoid whose moments of inertia about all axes are the same as those of a given body.—Momental ellipsoid, or inverse ellipsoid of inertia, a surface of which every radius vector is inversely proportional to the radius of gyration of the body about that radius vector as an axis. This is sometimes called Poisson's ellipsoid, though invented by Cauchy.—Reciprocal ellipsoid of expansion, the surface of which each radius vector is inversely proportional to the square root of the linear expansion in the same direction.—Strain-ellipsoid, or ellipsoid of expansion, the ellipsoid into which any strain transforms any infinitesimal sphere in a body.

ellipsoidal (el-ip-soi'dal), a. Of the form of an ellipsoid.

elliptic, elliptical (e-lip'tik, -ti-kal), a. [= F. elliptique = Sp. elíptico = Pg. elíptico = It. ellittico, ellittico (cf. D. G. elliptisch = Dan. Sw. elliptisk), < ML. ellipticus, < Gr. ἐλλειπτικός, in grammar, elliptical, defective, < ἐλλειψω (< ἐλλειψω), ellipse, ellipse; see ellipse, ellipsis.] 1. Pertaining to an ellipse; having the form of an ellipse. [Elliptical is the more common form except in technical uses, and is frequent in them.]

In horses, oxen, goats, sheep, the pupil of the eye is elliptical, the transverse axis being horizontal.

Paley, Nat. Theol., III.

2. Pertaining to or marked by ellipsis; defective; having a part left out.

In all matters the [early writers] affected curt phrases; and it has been observed that even the colloquial style was barbarously elliptical. D. Israeli, Anen. of Lit., II. 362.

His [Thucydides's] mode of reasoning is singularly elliptical; in reality most consecutive, yet in appearance often incoherent. Macaulay, Athenian Orators.

Production and productive are, of course, elliptical expressions, involving the idea of a something produced; but this something, in common apprehension, I conceive to be, not utility, but wealth. J. S. Mill.

3. In entom., elongate-ovate; more than twice as long as broad, parallel-sided in the middle, and rounded at both ends, but in general more broadly so at the base; applied especially to the abdomen, as in many Hymenoptera.—4. In math., having a pair of characteristic elements imaginary: as, an elliptic involution.

Elliptical gearing. See gearing.—Elliptic arc, a part of an ellipse.—Elliptic chuck. Same as oval chuck (which see, under chuck).—Elliptic compasses, an instrument for describing an ellipse by continued motion.—Elliptic conoid, an ellipsoid.—Elliptic coordinates. See coordinate.—Elliptic cycloid. See cycloid.—Elliptic function, a doubly periodic function analogous to a trigonometrical function, and the inverse of an elliptic integral.—Elliptic integral, an integral expressing the length of the arc of an ellipse.—Elliptic involution, one which has no real double points.—Elliptic motion, motion on an ellipse so that equal areas are described about one of the foci in equal times.—Elliptic point on a surface, an asymptotic point, a point having the indicatrix an ellipse; a point where the principal tangents are imaginary.—Elliptic polarisation. In optics. See polarization.—Elliptic singularity, an ordinary or essential singularity of a function. See singularity.—Elliptic space. (a) The space enclosed by an ellipse. (b) See space.—Elliptic spindle, a surface generated by the revolution of an ellipse are about its chord.

elliptically (e-lip'ti-kal-i), adv. 1. According to the form of an ellipse.

Reflection from the surfaces of metals, and of very high refractive substances such as diamond, generally gives at all incidences elliptically polarised light. Tait, Light, § 27.

2. In the manner of or by an ellipse; with something left out.

ellipticity (el-ip-tis'i-ti), n. [< elliptic + -ity.] The quality of being elliptic; the degree of divergence of an ellipse from the circle; specifically, in reference to the figure of the earth, the difference between the equatorial and polar semi-diameters divided by the equatorial: as, the ellipticity of the earth is $\frac{1}{298}$. It may also without appreciable error be taken as twice the difference divided by the sum of the two axes.

In 1740 Maclaurin . . . gave the equation connecting the ellipticity with the proportion of the centrifugal force at the equator to gravity. Encyc. Brit., VII. 600.

elliptograph (e-lip'tō-gráf), n. Same as ellipsograph.

ellipsoid (e-lip'toid), a. and n. [< elliptic + -oid.] I. a. Somewhat like an ellipse.

II. n. Same as ellipsoid.

elliptois (e-lip'tō-is), n. [Irreg. < Gr. ἐλλειψω, ellipse; see ellipse.] A curve defined by the equation $ay^m + x^n = by^m (a - x^n)$, where m and n are both greater than 1. Also called infinite ellipse.—Cubic elliptois. See cubic.

ellmother (el'muth'ér), n. A dialectal form of eldmother. Brackett, [Prov. Eng.]

elloopa (e-lō'pā), n. Same as ilupa. See Bassia. Elloopia (e-lō'pi-ā), n. [NL. (Treitschke, 1825), < Gr. ἐλλοοπία, elloopia, a fish; see Elopa.] In entom.: (a) A genus of geometrid moths, having a slender body, short, slender, obliquely ascending palpi whose third joint is conical and minute, and entire delicate wings, of one color and not bent on the exterior border. There are upward of 12 species, European, Australian, and American. (b) A genus of leaf beetles (Chrysomelidae), having one species, E. pedestris, of Tasmania.

ellwand, elwand (el'wond), n. [ell + wand.] 1. An old mete-yard or measuring-rod, which in England was 45 inches long, and in Scotland 37 Scotch or 37.0858 English inches, the standard being the Edinburgh ellwand.

A lively, bustling, arch fellow, whose pack and oaken ellwand, studded duly with brass points, denoted him to be of Autolycus a professional. Scott, Kenilworth, xix.

2. [cap.] In Scotland, the asterism otherwise known as the Girdle or Belt of Orion. Also called Our Lady's Ellwand.

ellyard, n. [ME. ellyerd, < elue, ell, + yerd, etc., yard.] A yard an ell long; a measuring-yard; an ellwand.

The beds of an ellyerd the large lenkthe hade, The grayn al of grone stole and of golde heven Sir Gawain and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 210 elm (elm), n. [ME. elm, < AS. elm = Icel. almr = Sw. alm = Dan. elm (alm, obs.) = D. elm = OHG. elm (-baum), afterward (simulating L. ulmus) MHG. ulm (-baum), (ulm = L. ulmus, elm.)] The common name for species of Ulmus (which see), mostly large trees, some common in cultivation for shade and ornament, for which the majestic height and the wide-spreading and gracefully curving branches of the principal kinds admirably adapt them. The hard, heavy timber of most of the species is valuable for many purposes. Of the European species, the common English elm is U. campestris, of which the cork-elm (U.

Flowering Branch and Foliage of English Elm (Ulmus campestris), with flower and fruit on larger scale suberosa), with thick plates of cork on the branches, is probably only a variety. The Scotch elm, or witch elm, U. montana, is a smaller tree than the English elm. The American species are distinguished as the American elm, white elm, or water-elm, U. americana, the cedar elm of Texas, U. crassifolia; the cork, elmt, hickory swamp, or rock-elm, U. racemosa; the red elm, slippery elm, or moose elm, U. fulva, the inner bark of which is mucilaginous, and is used in medicine; and the winged elm, or wahoo, U. alata, with corky winged branches. In Australia the name is given to the Aphananthe Philippensis, a species allied to the true elm. In the West Indies Cordia Gerascanthus and C. gerascanthoides, of the order Boraginaceae, receive the name, as also the rubaceous Hamelia ventricosa. The wood is the toughest of European woods, and is considered to bear the driving of bolts and nails better than any other. It is very durable under water, and is frequently used for keels of ships, for boat building, and for many structures exposed to wet, or when great strength is required. Because of its toughness it is used for masts of wheels, shells for tackle blocks, and common turnery. With elm is much used by coach-makers, and by ship-builders for making jolly boats. Rock-elm is much used in boat building, and to some extent for bows.

The elm delights in a warm, sweet, and fertile land, something more inclined to moisture, and where good pasture is produced.

When the broad elm, sole empress of the plain,
Whose circling shadow speaks a century's reign,
Wrathes in the cloude her regal diadem—
A forest waving on a single stem

W. W. Holmes, Poetry.

elmen (el'men), a. [elm + -en.] Of or pertaining to the elm, or consisting of elm. Also, less properly, elmin. [Rare.]

Leaning against the elmin tree,
With drooping head and slackened knee,
With clenched teeth, and close-clasped hands,
In agony of soul he stands.

Scott, Rokeby, ll. 27.

elmo, elmeset, n. Middle English forms of alma.

Elmidae (el'mi-dē), n. pl. [NL. < Elmis + -idae.] A family of clavicorn Coleoptera, taking name from the genus Elmis: now called Parnidae (which see).

elmin, a. See elmen.

Elmis (el'mis), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1802).] A genus of clavicorn beetles, of the family Parnidae, having only five ventral segments and rounded anterior coxae. E. condimentarius is so named from being said to be used for flavoring food in Peru. The genus is wide-spread, species occurring in Europe, Australia, North and South America. There are 21 in North America and about twice as many in other countries.

elm-leaf beetle. See Galeruca.

Elmo's fire, St. Elmo's fire

(el'moz fir, sant el'moz fir).

[After Saint Elmo, bishop of Forme, a town of ancient Italy, who died about 304, and whom sailors in the Mediterranean invoke during a storm.] Same as corpusant.

elm-tree (elm'trē), n. See elm.

elm-wood (elm'wad), n. The wood of the elm-tree.

elmy (el'mi), a. [elm + -y.] Abounding with elms.

If thy farm stands
Near Cotswold downs, or the delicious groves
Of Symonds, honour'd through the sandy soil
Of clay loam, . . .
Rejoice this sort

Light bending on thy banks thy clay vales, Thy venerable oaks. Southey.

elnet, n. An obsolete form of ell.

It must not be measured by the intermediate elne of it selfe. Lord Brooke's letter to an Honourable Lady (1650), l.

elocation (ē-lō-kā'shon), n. [ML. elocatio (-n), a hiring out, < L. elocare, let out, hire out, < e, out, + locare, place, let, hire out; see locate. In the second sense taken in the lit. meaning 'put out of place.')] 1. The act of hiring out or apprenticing.

There may be some particular cases incident, wherein perhaps this (consent in marriage) may without sin or blame be forborne, as when the child, either by general permission, or former elocation, shall be out of the parents' disposing. Ep. Hall, Cases of Conscience, iv. 1.

2. Departure from the usual state or mood; displacement; an ecstasy.

In all poetry . . . there must be an elocation and emotion of the mind. Plutarch, Aethiopia, p. 30.

elocular (ē-lōk'ū-lār), a. [L. e, out, + loculus, a compartment, a little place, dim. of locus, a place; see loculus, locus.] In bot., not partitioned; having no compartments or loculi.

elocation (el-ō-kū'shon), n. [F. elocation = Sp. elocucion = Port. eloquādo = It. elocuzione, < L. elocutio (-n), a speaking out, utterance, esp. rhetorical utterance; < elocui, pp. elocutus, speak out, utter, < e, out, + loqui, speak. Cf. eloquence.] 1. The manner of speaking in public; the art of correct delivery in speaking or reading; the art which teaches the proper use of the voice, gesture, etc., in public speaking.

Elocution, which anciently embraced style and the whole art of rhetoric, now signifies manner of delivery, whether of our own thoughts or those of others. E. Porter.

2). Eloquence in style or delivery; effective utterance or expression.

As I have endeavored to adorn it with noble thoughts, so much more to express those thoughts with elocation. Dryden.

Graceful to the sense, Godfrey rose,
And deep the strain of elocution flows.
Brooks, in, of Lassie's Journal (Delivered).

3. Speech; the power or act of speaking.

Whose taste . . . gave elocation to the muse. Milton, P. L., l. 748.

Can you deliver a whole of questions without a quickening of your elocation? A. Phelps, English Style, p. 206.

Syn. 1. Elocution, Delivery. The words are quite independent of their derivation. Elocution has narrowed its meaning (see quotation from E. Porter, above), and has broadened it to take in gesture. They are now essentially the same, covering bodily carriage and gesture as well as the use of the voice. Elocution sometimes seems more manifestly a matter of art than delivery. See oratory.

elocutionary (ē-lō-kū'shon-ār-ē), a. [ELocutio + -ary.] Of or pertaining to elocution.

elocutioner (ē-lō-kū'shon-er), n. A public speaker or declaimer. [Colloq.]

They these chaffing young fellows that think nothing of the fundamental of their faith, but are crying out about the elocutionary and poetramongers, they've no end in Gilead. W. Black, In For Locks.

elocutionist (ē-lō-kū'shon-ist), n. [ELocutio + -ist.] A person versed in the art of elocution; one who teaches or writes upon elocution, or who gives public elocutionary readings or exercises.

Elmis glabra. Line shows natural size.

elocutive (el'ō-kū-tiv), a. [ELocutio + -ive.] Pertaining to elocution.

Proseching in its elocutive part is but the conception of man, and differs as the gifts and abilities of men give it lustre or depression. Veitman, Resolves, ll. 48.

elod (el'ōd), n. [ELectric + od.] Electric od; the supposed odic force of electricity. Reichenbach.

elodian (ē-lō'di-an), n. One of the marsh-tortoises, a group of chelonians corresponding to the families Chelydridae and Emydidae.

éloge (a-lōzh'), n. [F.; see clergy.] A panegyric; a funeral oration; specifically, one of the class of biographical eulogies pronounced upon all members of the French academies after their death, of which many volumes have been published.

I return you, sir, the two éloges, which I have perused with pleasure. I borrow that word from your language, because we have none in our own that exactly expresses it. Ep. Atterbury, To M. Thiriot, Ep. Corr., l. 170.

elogia, n. Plural of elogium.

elogist (el'ō-jist), n. [= F. élogiste = Sp. (obs.) R. elogista, as clergy + -ist.] One who pronounces a panegyric, especially upon the dead; one who delivers an éloge. [Rare.]

[One] made the funeral sermon who had been one of her professed sutors; and so she did not want a passionate éloge, as well as an excellent preacher. Sir H. Watton, Reliquie, p. 300.

elogium (ē-lō'ji-um), n.; pl. elogia (-jē). [L.; see clergy.] Same as clergy.

But if Jesus of Nazareth had raised an army in defence of their liberty, and had destroyed the Romans, . . . then they would willingly have given him that title, which was set up only in derision as the Eloquium of his Cross, Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews. Stillington, Sermons, l. viii.

elogy (el'ō-jē), n.; pl. elogies (-jiz). [= F. élog = Sp. Pg. It. elogio, < L. elogium, a short maxim or saying, an inscription on a tombstone, a clause in a will, a judicial abstract, appar. a dim. of logus, logos, a word, a saying (< Gr. λόγος, a word; see logos), with prefix e-, after eloqui, speak out; cf. eloquium, eloquence, also a declaration.] A funeral oration; an éloge. [Rare, elogy, a different word, being used in its stead.]

In the centre, or midst of the pegme, there was an aback, or square, wherein this elogy was written.

B. Jonson, King James's Coronation Entertainment.

Elohim (el'ō-him), n. pl. [Heb. Elohim, pl. of Elah; see Allah.] One of the names of God, of frequent occurrence in the Hebrew text of the Old Testament. Biblical critics are not agreed as to the reason for the use of the plural form: some regard it as a covert suggestion of the Trinity; others as a plural of excellence; others as an indication of an earlier polytheistic belief, still others as an embodiment of the Hebrew faith that the powers represented by the gods of the heathen were all included in one Divine Person.

Elohim (el'ō-hizim), n. [ELohim + -izm.] Worship of God as Elohim.

It was the task of the great prophets to eliminate the distinctive religion of Jahveh . . . and to bring Israel back to the primitive Elohim of the patriarchs. Edinburgh Rev., l. xlv. 302.

Elohist (el'ō-hist), n. [ELohim + -ist.] A title given to the supposed writer (a unity of authorship being assumed) of the Elohist passages of the Pentateuch, in contradistinction to Jehovist.

The descriptions of the Elohist are regular, orderly, clear, simple, unadorned, calm, free from the rhetorical and poetical. S. Davidson.

It no longer seems worth while to write poetic essays to show that the Elohist was versed in all the conclusions of modern geology. N. A. Rev., l. cxvii. 334.

Elohistie (el'ō-his'tik), a. [ELohist + -ic.]

A term applied to certain passages in the Pentateuch, in which God is always spoken of in the Hebrew text as Elohim, supposed by some to have been written at an earlier period than those passages in which he is spoken of as Jehovah. The Elohistie passages are simpler, more pastoral and more primitive in their character than the Jehovistie. Gen. i. 27 is Elohistie, Gen. ii. 24 is Jehovistie.

The New Testament authors followed the Elohistie account, and speak of him [Edmund] disparagingly. Encyc. Brit., lli. 290.

eloin, eloignatet, etc. See eloin, etc.

eloin, eloign (ē-lō-in'), v. e. [Also written eloine, eloigne; < OF. eloigner, eloigner, F. éloigner = Pr. esloignar, esloignar, < LL. eloignare, remove, keep aloof, prolong, etc.; see clong.] I. trans. To separate and remove to a distance.

From worldly cares himself he did eloin. Spenser, F. Q., l. iv. 70.

Eloigne, sequester, and divorce her, from her bed and your board. Chapman, All Fools, iv. l.

I'll tell thee now (dear love) what thou shalt do
To anger destiny, as she doth us;
How I shall stay, though she eloin me thus.

Donne, Valediction to his Book.

If the person be conveyed out of the sheriff's jurisdiction, the sheriff may return that he is *eloin*ed.

Blackstone, Comm., III. viii.

II. intrans. To abscond.

eloinate, eloinatet (ē-loi-nāt), v. t. [< eloin, eloin, + -ate², after elongate, q. v.] To remove; eloin.

Nor is some vulgar Greek so far adulterated, and eloinatet from the true Greek, as Italian is from the Latin.

Howell, Foreign Travel, p. 119.

eloinment, eloinment (ē-loi-nēnt), n. [< eloin, eloin, + -ment, after eloinment.] Removal to a distance; hence, distance; remoteness.

He discovers an eloinment from vulgar phrases much becoming a person of quality.

Shenstone.

elomet, n. Ornament.

elong (ē-lōng'), v. t. [< L. elongare, remove, keep aloof, prolong, protract, < e, out, + longus, long; see long¹. Cf. eloin.] 1. To elongate; lengthen out.

No pulle it not, but goodly plume elonge,
Nor pteche it not to sore into the vale,
Nor broke it not all down about a dale.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 4.

2. To put far off; retard.

By sea, and hills elonged from thy sight,
Thy wonted grace reducing to my mind,
Instead of sleep thus I occupy the night.

Wyatt, The Lover Prayeth Venus.

Upon the roof the bird of sorrow sat,
Elonging joyful day with her and note.

G. Fletcher, Christ's Triumph, II. 21.

elongate (ē-lōng'gāt), v.; pret. and pp. elongated, ppr. elongating. [< L. elongatus, pp. of elongare; see elong.] 1. To make long or longer; lengthen; extend, stretch, or draw out in length; as, to elongate a rope by splicing.

Here the spire turns round a very elongated axle.
W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 165.

2. To remove further off.

The first star of Arctus in the time of Meton the Athenian was placed in the intersection, which is now elongated and removed eastward twenty eight degrees.

Sir T. Bracco, Vulg. Err., iv. 13.

II. intrans. To recede; move to a greater distance; particularly, to recede apparently from the sun, as a planet in its orbit. [Rare.]

elongate (ē-lōng'gāt), a. [< L. elongatus, pp. see the verb.] Lengthened; extended or produced; attenuated; specifically, in zool. and bot., disproportionately or comparatively long or extended; as, a worm has an elongate body; a proboscis is an elongate snout; elongate antennae are about as long as the body of an insect; elongate elytra extend beyond the abdomen; an elongate flower-stem.

elongation (ē-lōng-gā'shon), n. [< ME. elongaciō, < OF. elongation, F. elongation = Pg. elongação = It. elongazione, < ML. elongatio(n-), < L. elongare, lengthen, elongate; see elong.] 1. The act of elongating or lengthening; the state of being elongated or lengthened.

This whole universality of things, which we call the world, is indeed nothing else but a production, and elongation, and dilatation of the natural goodness of Almighty God.

Kutherford, Atheism, p. 236.

To this motion of elongation of the fibres is owing the union or conglutination of the parts of the body, when they are separated by a wound.

Arbuthnot, Aliments.

2. Extension; continuation.

His skin (excepting only his face and the palms of his hands) was entirely grown over with an horny excrescence called by the naturalists the elongation of the papillae.

Cambridge, The Scyllerian, note.

May not the mountains of Westmoreland and Cumberland be considered as elongations of these two chains?

London.

3. Distance; space which separates one thing from another. Glanville. -- 4. A removing to a distance; removal; recession.

Our voluntary elongation of ourselves from God's presence must needs be a fearful introduction to an everlasting distance from him.

Br. Hall, Remains, p. 89.

Concerning the nature or proper effects of this spot or stain (upon the soul), they have not been agreed: some call it an obligation or a guilt of punishment. . . . Some fancy it to be an elongation from God, by dissimilitude of conditions.

J. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 723.

5. In astron.: (a) The angular distance of a planet from the sun, as it appears to the eye of a spectator on the earth; apparent departure of a planet from the sun in its orbit; as, the elongation of Venus or Mercury. (b) The angular distance of a satellite from its primary. -- 6. In surg.: (a) A partial dislocation, occasioned by the stretching or lengthening of the ligaments. (b) The extension of a part beyond its natural dimensions.

elongative (ē-lōng-gā-tiv), a. [< elongate + -ive.] Tending to, productive of, or exhibiting elongation; extended. [Rare.]

This elongative effort. Congregationalist, Oct. 22, 1885.

elope (ē-lōp'), v. t.; pret. and pp. eloped, ppr. eloping. [Formerly also ellope; < D. ontloopen (= G. entlaufen = Dan. unløbe), run away, < ont- (= G. ent- = AS. and-: see and-), away, + loopen, run (> E. lope, q. v.), = AS. hleðpan, E. leap, q. v.] To run away; escape; break loose from legal or natural ties; specifically, to run away with a lover or paramour in defiance of duty or social restraints.

But now, when Philtra saw my hands decay
And former Ivelod fayle, she left me quight,
And to my brother did elope straight way.

Spenser, F. Q., V. iv. 9.

It is necessary to treat women as members of the body politic, since great numbers of them have eloped from their allegiance.

Addison, Freeholder.

Love and elope, as modern ladies do

Cawthorn, Nobility.

Southey writes to his daughter Edith in 1824, "All the maids eloped because I had turned a man out of the kitchen at eleven o'clock on the preceding night."

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 265.

elopement (ē-lōp'mēnt), n. [< elope + -ment.] A running away; an escape; private or unlicensed departure from the place or station to which one is bound by duty or law; specifically applied to the running away of a woman, married or unmarried, with a lover.

The negligent husband, trusting to the efficacy of his principle, was undone by his wife's elopement from him.

Arbuthnot.

Her imprudent elopement from her father

Graves.

But in case of elopement . . . the law allows her no alimony.

Blackstone, Comm., II. xv.

eloper (ē-lōp'pēr), n. One who elopes.

Nothing less, believe me, shall ever urge my consent to wound the chaste propriety of your character, by making you an eloper with a duellist.

Mrs. Barrow, Cecilia, II.

Elopes (ē-lōp'ēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Elops.] A group of malacoptygian fishes: same as the family Elopidae.

Elophilæ (ē-lōf'i-lē), n. pl. [NL. (Hübner, 1816), prop. Helophilæ, < Gr. ἑλος, palus, a marsh, + φίλος, loving.] A group of pyralid moths.

elopian (ē-lō-pi-an), n. A fish of the family Elopidae. Sir J. Richardson.

Elopidae (ē-lōp'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Elops + -idae.] A family of eluiform isospondylous fishes, resembling herrings, but much larger. They have a completed lateral line and a flat membrane between the branches of the lower jaw. They have cycloid scales, naked head, and terminal mouth, bounded on the sides by the supramaxillaries, which are composed of three elements. The species are very few, though widely distributed in tropical and subtropical seas, sometimes entering fresh water. They belong to the genera Elops and Megalops. See cut under Elops.

Elopina (ē-lō-pi-nā), n. pl. [NL., < Elops + -ina.] In Günther's classification of fishes, the sixth group of his Chupeida, with the upper jaw shorter than the lower, the abdomen rounded, and an osseous gular plate: same as the family Elopidae.

elopine (ē-lō-pi-nē), a. and n. I. A. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Elopina.

II. n. A fish of the group Elopina.

elopitnum, n. An old name for vitriol.

Elops (ē-lōps), n. [NL., < L. elops, < Gr. ἑλος, prop. ἑλῶς, a sea-fish, also a serpent so called, prop. adj., nute.] The typical genus of the family Elopidae. E. saurus, known as the ten-gonander and big-eyed herring, is a widely diffused species in both the Atlantic and the Pacific.

Big-eyed Herring, Elops saurus.

eloquence (ē-lō-kwēns), a. [< ME. eloquence, < OF. eloquence, F. éloquence = Pr. eloquencia, eloquēda = Sp. eloquencia = Pg. eloquencia = It. eloquenzia (obs.), eloquenza, < L. eloquentia, < eloquen(t)-s, eloquent; see eloquent.] 1. The quality of being eloquent; moving utterance or expression; the faculty, art, or act of uttering or employing thoughts and words springing from or expressing strong emotion in a manner to excite corresponding emotion in others; by extension, the power or quality of exciting emotion, sympathy, or interest in any way; as, pulpit eloquence; a speaker, speech, or writing of great eloquence; the eloquence of tears or of silent grief.

There is non that is here,

Of eloquence that shal be thy pere.

Chaucer, Prolog. to Franklin's Tale, l. 6.

True eloquence [in source or origin] I find to be none but the serious and hearty love of truth.

Milton, Apology for Smectymnus.

By eloquence we understand the overflow of powerful feelings upon occasions fitted to excite them.

De Quincey, Rhetoric.

What is called eloquence in the forum is commonly found to be rhetoric in the study.

Thoreau, Walden, p. 111.

[Hugh] Peters would seem to have been one of those men gifted with what is sometimes called eloquence; that is, the faculty of stating things powerfully from momentary feeling, and not from that conviction of the higher reason which alone can give force and permanence to words.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 362.

2. That which is expressed in an eloquent manner; as, a flow of eloquence.

Then I'll commend her volubility,

And say she uttereth piercing eloquences.

Shak., T. of the S., II. 1.

= Syn. 1. Elocution, Rhetoric, etc. See oratory.

or parry a blow, frustrate, deceive, mock, < e, out, + ludere, play: see ludicrous. Cf. allude, collude, delude, elude.] 1. To avoid by artifice, stratagem, deceit, or dexterity; escape; evade:
as, to elude pursuit, to elude a blow or stroke.

The stroke of lightning may also be evaded by power, or eluded by slight, by skill, by favour.
Barrow, Works, II. 333.

Thou stick with Argus Eyes your Keeper were,
Advised by me, you shall elude his care.

Compton, tr. of Job's Art of Love.

We gentle Delia beckons from the plain.
Then, hid in shades, elude her eager swain.

Pope, Spring, I. 54.

By making concessions apparently candid and ample,
they elude the great accusation.

Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

2. To remain unseen, undiscovered, or unexplained by; baffle the inquiry or scrutiny of; as, secrets that elude the keenest search.

On this subject Providence has thought fit to elude our curiosity. Goldsmith, Vicar, XIII.

One element must forever elude its roseal bow; and that is the very element by which poetry is poetry.

Macaulay, Dryden.

His mind was quick, versatile, and imaginative; few aspects of a subject eluded it. Edinburgh Rev.

The secret and the mystery
Have baffled and eluded me.

Longfellow, Golden Legend, I. Prol.

—Syn. To shun, flee, shirk, dodge, baffle, foil, frustrate.

eludible (ē-lū'di-bl), a. [< elude + -ible.] Capable of being eluded or escaped.

If this blessed part of our law be eludible at pleasure, we shall have little reason to boast of our advantage in this particular over other states or kingdoms in Europe.

Swift, Drapier's Letters, VII.

dere*, elude, + -ive.] Eluding, or having a tendency to elude; hard to grasp or confine; slippery.

Hurd on the crage, behold they grasp, they bleed!
And, growling, cling upon the elusive weed.

Palmer, Shipwreck, III.

Plots are too subtle and elusive to be drawn into and confined in definitions. Atwell, Table Talk, p. 102.

The moon was full, and snowed down the mellow light on the gray domes, which in their soft, elusive outlines, and strange effect of far withdrawn, rhymed like elusi- beard to tapers to the bright and vivid arches of the facade.

Hawthorne, Venetian Life, xviii.

elusively (ē-lū'siv-ly), adv. With or by elusion.

elusiveness (ē-lū'siv-ness), n. The quality of being elusive; tendency to elude.

it is harder to be eluted by the blood.

Arbuthnot, Aliments, v.

elution (ē-lū'shon), n. [< L. elutio (-n-), a washing, < L. elucere, wash off.] A washing out; any process by which bodies are separated by the action of a solvent; specifically, a process of recovering sugar from molasses, which consists in precipitating the sugar as granulate of lime, insoluble in cold water, and washing it free from soluble impurities. The granulate is decomposed by carbonic acid, which precipitates the lime as carbonate, and the pure sugar solution is then evaporated to crystallization.

elutriate (ē-lū'tri-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. elutriated, ppr. elutriating. [< L. elutriatus, pp.
of elutriare, wash out, decant, rack off, < *eluelvan (ē'vān), n. An improper form of elfin.

elvan (ē'vān), n. [Of Corn. origin.] The name given in Cornwall (England) to dikes, which are of frequent occurrence in that region, and which, throughout the principal mining districts, have a course approximately parallel with the majority of the most productive tin and copper lodes. The elvans or elvan courses, as they are frequently called, have almost identically the same ultimate chemical and mineralogical composition as the granites of Cornwall, but differ considerably from them in the mode of aggregation of their constituents. They vary in width from a few feet to several fathoms; they traverse dikes granites and slates, but are more numerous in the vicinity of the granites than they are elsewhere. Many elvans have been worked for the tin ore which they sometimes contain. The rock of which elvans are made up when occurring in loose fragments is also called elvan or elvan rock.

elvanite (ē'vān-īt), n. [ē L. e, out, + van, to flow.] The name given by some lithologists to the variety of rock of which the Cornish elvans are made up; nearly equivalent to quartz-porphry and granitic porphyry.

Elysian shades, Massinger, Virgin Martyr, iv. 3.
In that Elysian age (misnamed of gold)
The age of love, and innocence, and joy,
When all were great and free? Beattie, Minstrel, l. 11.
Hope's Elysian isles, O W. Holmes, Fountain of Youth.
There is no Death! What seems so is transition;
This life of mortal breath
Is but the suburb of the life Elysian, Whose portal we call Death.
Longfellow, Resignation.

Elysian Fields [cf. F. Champs-Élysées = Sp. Campos Elíseos = Pg. Campos Elísios or simply Elísios = It. Campi Elisi, < L. Campi Elysii or simply Elysii, tr. of Gr. Ἕλυσια πεδία; see Elysium], Elysium.

elysid (ē-lis'ī-d), n. A gastropod of the family Elysidae.

Elysidae (ē-lis'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Elysia + -idae.] A family of marine saccoglossate polychaete gastropods, with auriform tentacles, without gills, and resembling slugs, but having the sides of the body alate. The whole shape is leaf-like, the neck corresponding to a petiole. Also spelled Elysidae. See cut under Elysia.

Elysium (ē-liz'ium), n. [= F. Élysée = Sp. Elísio, Elísio = Pg. Elísio, Elísio = It. Elísio, < L. Elysium (ML. also Elysium), < Gr. Ἕλυσιον (neut. of Ἕλυσια, Elysian), in Ἕλυσια πεδία, later in pl. Ἕλυσια πεδία, the Elysian Field, or Fields, L. e., the field of the departed, lit. of going or coming, < elysion, var. of elysion, a going or coming, advent, < elysion, future, elysion (ind. elysion, elysion), 3d aor., go, come (associated with elysion, go, come), whence also prob. elysion, free.] In Gr. myth., the abode of the blessed after death. Also called the Elysian Fields. It is placed by Homer on the western border of the earth, by Hesiod and Pindar in the Islands of the Blest; by later poets in the nether world. It was conceived of as a place of perfect delight. In modern literature Elysium is often used for any place of exquisite happiness, and as synonymous (without religious reference) to Heaven.

Once more, farewell! go, find Elysium,
There where the happy souls are crowned with blessings.
Pletcher, Valentinian, III. 1.

The flowery-kirtled Nardus . . .
Who, as they sung, would take the prison's soul,
And lap it in Elysium. Milton, Comus, l. 257.

It is this, it is this.
Moore, Light of the Harem.

An Elysium more pure and bright than that of the Greeks. Is. Taylor.

elytra, n. Plural of elytrum.

elytral (ē'lī-tral), a. [elytrum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the elytra; as, elytral strim; elytral sulci. Elytral ligula, a tongue-like process on the inner face of the side margins of the elytrum, serving to hold it more securely to the abdomen in repose, found in certain aquatic beetles. Elytral plica or fold, a longitudinal ridge on the interior surface of each elytrum, near the outer margin. In repose it embraces the upper surface of the abdomen.

elytriform (ē-lī-trī-fōrm), a. [ē NL. elytrum, elytrum, + L. forma, shape.] Having the form or character of an elytrum; elytriform.

elytrigerous (ē-lī-trī-jē-rus), a. [ē NL. elytrum, elytrum, + L. gerere, carry, + ous.] Having elytra, or bearing an elytrum.

The order of arrangement of the elytrigerous and elytrigerous somites (of Polypna) is very curious.
Hadden, Am. Invert, p. 206.

elytrine (ē'lī-trīn), n. [ē L. elytrum + -ine.] The substance of which the horny covering of coleopterous insects is composed.

elytritis (ē-lī-trī'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. elytron, a sheath (vagina), + -itis.] Colpitis; vaginitis.

elytrocele (ē'lī-trō-sēl), n. [ē Gr. elytron, a sheath (vagina), + kyklos, a tumor.] Same as colpocoele.

elytro-episiorrhaphy (ē'lī-trō-ep'ī-si-ōr'ā-fī), n. [ē Gr. elytron, a sheath (vagina), + episiorrhaphy.] A combination of colporrhaphy with episiorrhaphy.

Elytrogona (ē-lī-trō-gō-nā), n. [NL., < Gr. elytron, a case, sheath, elytrum, + gonos, producing; see gonous.] A genus of phytophagous beetles, of the family Cassididae.

elytroid (ē'lī-trō-id), a. [ē Gr. elytron, a sheath, + -oides, form.] Elytriform; sheath-like; vaginal.

elytron, n. See elytrum.

elytropiclastic (ē'lī-trō-plas'tik), a. [As elytropiclastic + -ic.] Same as colpoclastic.

elytropiclastic (ē'lī-trō-plas'tik), n. [ē Gr. elytron, a sheath (vagina), + plasticos, form.] Same as colpoclastic.

Elytrotora (ē-lī-trō-tō-rā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. elytron, a case, sheath, elytrum, + tora, a wing.] Cherville's name (1806) of the group of insects now known as the order Coleoptera. It is never current, as the nearly contemporaneous arrangement of Illiger, which combined the Linnean and Fabrician systems, and adopted Ray's name Coleoptera, came at once into general use.

elytrotosis (ē'lī-trō-tō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. elytron, a sheath (vagina), + tosis, a fall, < erros, fall.] In pathol., prolapse of the vagina.

elytrotaphy (ē-lī-trō-tā-fī), n. [ē Gr. elytron, a sheath (vagina), + taphē, a seam, suture, < taphō, sew.] Same as colporrhaphy.

elytrotomy (ē-lī-trō-tō-mī), n. [ē Gr. elytron, a sheath (vagina), + tōmē, a cutting.] A cutting into the vaginal walls.

elytrum, elytron (ē'lī-trūm, -trōn), n.; pl. elytra (-trā). [NL.; < Gr. elytron, a cover; covering, as a case, sheath, shard of a beetle's wing, shell, husk, capsule, etc. (cf. elytra, a case, cover), < elytron, roll round, wrap up, cover.]

1. In entom., the modified fore wing of beetles or Coleoptera, forming with its fellow of the opposite side a hard, horny, or leathery case or sheath, more or less completely covering and protecting the posterior membranous wings when these are folded at rest, and usually forming an extensive portion of the upper surface of a beetle; a shard. The elytra are also known as wing-covers or wing-sheaths. They are elevated during flight, but do not serve as wings. See cuts under Coleoptera and beetle.

2. In some chaetopodous annelids, as the Aphroditiidae, or polychaetous annelids, as the Polynoe, one of the squamous lamellae overlying one another on the dorsal surface of the worm, made by a modification of the dorsal cutri of the parapodia, of which they are thus specialized appendages. Auriculate, bispinose, connate, dimidiate, etc., elytra. See the adjectives.

Elzevir (ēl'zē-vēr), a. and n. [F. Elzévir, formerly also Elsevier, D. Elsevier.] I. a. 1. Of or belonging to the Elzevir family of Dutch printers. See below.—2. Noting a cut of printing-type. See II., 2.

Elzevir editions, editions of the Latin, French, and German classics, and other works, published by a family of Dutch printers named Elzevir (Elzevier) at Leyden and Amsterdam, chiefly between 1583 and 1680. These editions are highly prized for their accuracy and the elegance of their type, printing, and general make-up. Those most esteemed are of small size, 24mo, 16mo, and 12mo.

II. n. 1. A book printed by one of the Elzevir family.—2. A form of old-style printing-type, with firm hair-lines and stubby serifs, largely used by the Elzevirs of the seventeenth century.

Elzevirian, Elzevirian (ēl'zē-vēr-i-an, -ri-an), n. [ē Gr. Elzevir + -ian, -ian.] A collector or fancier of Elzevir books. See extract under grangerite.

An "Early-English dramatist," or an Elzevirian.
New Princeton Rec., V. 275.

em (ēm), n. [ME. em, < AS. em, < L. em, the name of the letter M, < e, the usual assistant vowel, + m; a Latin formation, the Gr. name being μ.] 1. The name of the thirteenth letter of the alphabet, usually written simply m or M.—2. In printing, the square of any size of type. The large square here shown is the em of the size pica; the small one is the em of the size nonpareil, the one here used. The em is the unit of measurement in calculating the amount of type in a piece of work, as a page, a column, or a book, the standard of reckoning being 1,000. Thus this page or this book contains so many thousand, or so many thousand and hundred, ems. In the United States it is also the unit in calculating the amount of work done by a compositor, while the em is generally used for that purpose in Great Britain.

em, em (always unaccented, un), pron. [Usually written and printed em, in 17th century often hem, being regarded as a "contraction" or abbreviation of them; but in fact the reg. descendant of ME. hem, him, heom, hom, ham, < AS. him, heom, dat. pl. of hē, he, hed, she, hit, it, the ME. and AS. dat. becoming the E. obj. (acc. and dat.), as in him and her, and the initial aspirate falling away as in it, and (in easy speech) in he, his, him, her; see he, she, it. But though this is the origin of em or em, the form could have arisen independently as a reduction of them, like 'at, 'ere, reduced forms in dial. speech of that, there.] In colloquial speech, the objective plural of he, she, it; equivalent to them.

For he could coin and counterfeit
New words with little or no wit . . .
And when with hasty noise he spoke em,
The ignorant for current took em.
S. Butler, Hudibras, I. 1. 102.

em-1. Assimilated form of em-1 before labials.

em-2. Assimilated form of em-2 before labials.

emacerate (ē-mas'ē-rāt), v. t. or t. [ē L. emacere, defined 'emaciated,' equiv. to emaciatum (see emaciate), if genuine, a mistaken form for 'emacratum, < e + macer (macer), legh, whence ult. E. meager, q. v.] To make or become lean; emaciate.

Elytron of Polypna, a polychaetous annelid, bearing a sheath, viewed from above, highly magnified.

Elysia viridis.

emaciation (ē-mā-si-ā'shōn), n. [emaciat + -ion.] A making or becoming lean; emaciation.

emaciate (ē-mā-si-āt), v.; pret. and pp. emaciated, ppr. emaciating. [L. emaciatum, pp. of emaciare (> It. emaciare), make lean, cause to waste away, < e, out, + maciare, make lean, < macies, leanness, < macere, be lean, macere (< maor), lean, whence ult. E. meager, q. v.] I. trans. To cause to lose flesh gradually; waste the flesh of; reduce to leanness: as, great suffering emaciates the body.

A cold sweat bedews his emaciated cheeks.

F. Knor, Christian Philosophy, § 56.

II. intrans. To lose flesh gradually; become lean, as by disease or pining; waste away, as flesh.

He (Aristotle) emaciated and pined away.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err. vii. 14.

emaciate (ē-mā-si-āt), a. [L. emaciatum, pp. of emaciare.] Thin; wasted; greatly reduced in flesh. [Poetical.]

Or groom invade me with defying front
And stern demeanour, whose emaciate steeds . . .
Had panted off beneath my goring steel.

T. Warton, Panegyric on Oxford Aic.

emaciation (ē-mā-si-ā'shōn), n. [= F. émaciation = Sp. emaciación = Pg. emacião = It. emaciazione; < L. as if emaciatum* (> emaciare, pp. emaciatum, make lean: see emaciate.) 1. The act of making lean or thin in flesh.—2. The state of becoming thin by gradual wasting of flesh; the state of being reduced to leanness.

Searchers cannot tell whether this emaciation or leanness were from a phthisis, or from an hectic fever.

Graunt, Bills of Mortality

Marked by the emaciation of abstinence.

Scott.

emaculate (ē-mak'-ū-lāt), v. t. [L. emaculatus, pp. of emaculare, clear from spots, < e, out, + macula, a spot: see macula and mail.] To free from spots or blemishes; remove errors from; correct.

Lipatus, Savile, Pichena, and others have taken great pains with him (Lucius) in emaculating the text, settling the reading, etc.

Hales, Golden Remains, p. 253.

emaculation (ē-mak'-ū-lā'shōn), n. [emaculate + -ion.] The act or operation of freeing from spots.

email, emailt, n. Same as amel.

Set rich rubies to feed emailt.

The raven a plume to peacock's tale

Pattenham, Partheniades, xv.

emanant (em'-ā-nant), a. and n. [L. emanans (> pp. of emanare, flow out, spring out of, arise, proceed from: see emanate.) I. a. Flowing, issuing, or proceeding from something else; becoming apparent by an effect.

The most wise counsel and purpose of Almighty God terminated in those two great transient or emanant acts or works, the works of creation and providence.

Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 36.

II. n. In math., the result of operating any number of times upon a quantity with the operator (x'd (dx) + y'd (dy) +, etc.). J. J. Sylvester, 1853. Cayley (1859) defines it as one of the coefficients of the quantity formed by substituting for x, y, etc., the elements of the quantity to which the emanant belongs, lx, my, ly + my, etc., and then considering l and m as the two facients of the new quantity so obtained.

emanate (em'-ā-nāt), v.; pret. and pp. emanated, ppr. emanating. [L. emanatus, pp. of emanare (> It. emanare = Sp. Pg. emanar = F. émaner, > E. emane, q. v.), flow out, spring out of, arise, proceed from, < e, out, + manare, flow: see manation, madid.] I. intrans. To flow out or issue; proceed, as from a source or origin; come or go forth: used chiefly of intangible things: as, light emanates from the sun; fragrance emanates from flowers; power emanates from the people.

That subsisting form of government from which all laws emanate.

De Quincy.

All the studies we heard emanated from Calcutta.

W. H. Russell, Diary in India, I. 2.

The Hebrew word used here (in Genesis) for light includes the allied forces of heat and electricity, which with light now emanate from the solar photosphere.

Dawson, Nature and the Bible, p. 92.

II. trans. To send or give out; manifest. [Rare.]

We spoke of bright topics only, his manner all the while emanating the silent sympathy which helps so much because it respects so much.

Quoted in Merriam's Bowles, II. 413.

emanate (em'-ā-nāt), a. [L. emanatus, pp.: see the verb.] Issuing out; emanant. [Rare.]

emanazione; < LL. emanatio (> n.), an emanation, < L. emanare, flow out: see emanate.]

1. The act of flowing or issuing from a fountainhead or origin; emission; radiation.—2. In philos.: (a) Efficient causation due to the essence and not to any particular action of the cause. Thus, when the trunk of a tree is moved, the branches go along with it by virtue of emanation. Hence—(b) The production of anything by such a process of causation, as from the divine essence. The doctrine of emanation appears in its noblest form in the Enneads of Plotinus, who makes sensible things to emanate from the Ideas, the Ideas to emanate from the Nous, and the Nous to emanate from the One. Iamblichus makes the One to emanate from the Good, thus going one step further. The Gnostics and Cabalists pushed the doctrine to fantastic developments.

In the work of the creation we see a double emanation of virtue from God. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i. 61.

3. That which issues, flows, or is given out from any substance or body; efflux; effluvia: as, the odor of a flower is an emanation of its particles.

Justice is the brightest emanation from the gospel.

Sidney Smith.

4. In alg., the process of obtaining the successive emanants of a quantity.

Regnault's chemical principle of substitution and the algebraical one of emanation are identical. J. J. Sylvester.

Emanationism (em'-ā-nā'shōn-izm), n. [emana- + -ism.] Devotion to theories of emanation.

It [superstition] settled very thickly again in the first Christian centuries, as cabalism, emanationism, neo-platonism, etc., with their hierarchies of spirit hosts.

G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 315.

emanatist (em'-ā-nā-tist), n. and a. [emanate + -ist.] I. n. In theol., one who believes in the efflux of other beings from the divine essence; especially, a member of one of the ancient Gnostic sects, such as that of the Valentinians, which maintained that other beings were so evolved. See emanation, 2 (b). II. a. In theol., of or pertaining to the doctrine of the emanatists.

When then it was taken into the service of these Emanatist (Valentinian and Manichean) doctrines, the Homocension implied nothing higher than a generic or specific bond of unity. . . . The Nicene Fathers, on the other hand, were able, under altered circumstances, to indicate for the word (Homocension) its true meaning, unaffected by any Emanatist gloss.

Liddon, Hampton Lectures, pp. 430, 440.

emanative (em'-ā-nā-tiv), a. [emanate + -ive.] Proceeding by emanation; issuing or flowing out, as an effect due to the mere existence of a cause, without any particular activity of the latter.

By an emanative cause is understood such a cause as merely by being, without any activity or causality imparted, produces an effect. Dr H. More, Immortal of Soul, I. 11.

It sometimes happens that a cause causes the effect by its own existence, without any causality distinct from its existence; and this by some is called emanative, which word, though feigned with repugnance to the analogy of the Latin tongue, yet is it to be used upon this occasion till a more convenient can be found out.

Burnet, Discourse, II. by a Gentleman.

'Tis against the nature of emanative effects, to substitute but by the continual influence of their cause.

Gravelle, Essay, I.

emanatively (em'-ā-nā-tiv-ly), adv. In or after the manner of an emanation; by emanation.

It is acknowledged by us that no natural, imperfect, created being can create or emanatively produce, a new substance which was not before, and give it its whole being.

Cudworth, Intellectual System.

emanatory (em'-ā-nā-tō-ri), a. [ML. emanatorius (neut. emanatorium, a fountain), < L. emanare, flow out: see emanate.] Having the nature of an emanation; emanative.

Nor is there any inconsistency that one substance should cause something else which we may in some sense call substance, though but secondary or emanatory.

Dr H. More, Immortal of Soul, I. 6.

émanche (ā-mānsh'), n. In her., same as manche. emancipate (ē-man'-si-pāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. emancipated, ppr. emancipating. [L. emancipatus, pp. of emancipare, emancipate (> It. emancipare = Sp. Pg. emancipar = F. émanciper = D. emanciperen = G. emancipieren = Dan. emancipere = Sw. emancipera, emancipate), declare (a son) free and independent of the father's power by the three-repeated act of mancipatio and manumissio, give from one's own power or authority into that of another, give up, surrender, < e, out, + mancipare, *man-*cupare, give over or deliver up, as property, by means of the formal act called mancipium, give up, transfer, < mancipis (mancip-), a purchaser, a contractor, lit. one who takes (the property or a symbol of it) in hand, < mancus, hand, + capere, take. From mancipis comes also mancipium, the formal act of purchase, hence a thing so purchased, and esp. a slave; but emancipare was not used in reference to freeing slaves, the word for this act being manumittere: see manumit.] 1. To set free from servitude or bondage by voluntary act; restore from slavery to freedom; liberate: as, to emancipate a slave.

When the dying slaveholder asked for the last sacraments, his spiritual attendants regularly assured him, as he loved his soul, to emancipate his brethren for whom Christ had died.

Macaulay.

2. To set free or liberate; in a general sense, to free from civil restriction, or restraint of any kind; liberate from bondage, subjection, or controlling power or influence: as, to emancipate one from prejudices or error.

They emancipated themselves from dependence.

Arbutnot.

No man can quite emancipate himself from his age and country.

Emerson, Essay, 1st ser., p. 319.

Syn. Emancipate, Manumit, Enfranchise, Liberate, *dis-*enthral, release, unfetter, unshackle. To manumit is the act of an individual formally freeing a slave; the word has no figurative use. To emancipate is to free from a literal or a figurative slavery: as, the slaves in the West Indies were emancipated; to emancipate the mind. To enfranchise is to bring into freedom or into civil rights; hence the word often refers to the lifting of a slave into full civil equality with freemen. Liberate is a general word for setting or making free, whether from slavery, from confinement, or from real or figurative oppressions, as fears, doubts, etc.

Thought emancipated itself from expression without becoming its tyrant.

Towell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 326.

All slaves that had been taken from the northern shore of the Gulf of Mexico were to be manumitted and returned to their country.

Ranscott, Hist. U. S., I. 52.

In the course of his life he [a Roman master] enfranchised individual slaves. On his death bed or by his will he constantly emancipated multitudes.

Lecky, Europ. Morals, I. 240.

To cast the captive's chains aside

And liberate the slave

Longfellow, The Good Part.

emancipate (ē-man'-si-pāt), a. [L. emancipatus, pp.: see the verb.] Freed; emancipated.

We have no slaves at home. Then why abroad?

And they themselves, once ferried o'er the wave

That parts us, are emancipated and lost!

Campbell, Task, II. 80.

emancipation (ē-man'-si-pā'shōn), n. [= F. émancipation = Sp. emancipación = Pg. emancipação = It. emancipazione = D. emancipatie = G. Dan. Sw. emancipation, < L. emancipatio (> L. emancipatus, pp. of emancipare, emancipate: see emancipate.] 1. The act of setting free from bondage, servitude, or slavery, or from dependence, civil restraints or disabilities, etc.; deliverance from controlling influence or subjection; liberation: as, the emancipation of slaves; emancipation from prejudice, or from burdensome legal disqualifications; the emancipation of Catholics by the act of Parliament passed in 1829.

Previous to the triumph of Emancipation in the Federal District there was no public provision for the education of the Blacks, whether bond or free.

H. Greeley, Amer. Conflict, II. 64.

Emancipation by testament acquired such dimensions that Augustus found it necessary to restrict the power; and he made several limitations, of which the most important was that no one should emancipate by his will more than one hundred of his slaves.

Lecky, Europ. Morals, I. 240.

2. The freeing of a minor from parental control. It may be accomplished by the contract of parent and child, and in the case of a female by marriage, and in some states by judicial decree. Catholic Emancipation Act. See Catholic Emancipation Proclamation. In U. S. hist., the proclamation by which, on January 1st, 1863, President Lincoln, as commander in chief of the armies of the United States, declared as a military measure, in accordance with notice proclaimed September 23d, 1862, that within certain specified territory in armed rebellion all persons held as slaves "were and henceforward shall be free."

With the Emancipation Proclamation legally operative and efficient the moment it was uttered? or, as many have maintained, only so far and so far as our armies reached the slaves of the slave-owning armies? The Nation, I. 163.

Gradual emancipation, the freeing of slaves by degrees or according to certain individual contingencies, as between specified ages or after a prescribed length of service. Slavery was extinguished by gradual emancipation in most of the original northern United States, and it was at an early date advocated by many in the more southern states. Laws were passed at different periods for gradual emancipation in the British and Spanish West Indies and in Brazil, but they have been in each instance finally superseded by acts for the absolute abolition of slavery. Syn. Release, manumission, enfranchisement.

emancipationist (ē-man'-si-pā'shōn-ist), n. [emancipation + -ist.] One who is in favor of or advocates the emancipation of slaves.—

Gradual emancipationist, in the history of slavery, one who favored gradual emancipation (which see, under emancipation).

emancipator (ē-man' si-pā-tor), n. [< I. L. emancipator, < L. emancipare, emancipate; see emancipate.] One who emancipates, or liberates from bondage or restraint.

Richard seized Cyprus not as a pirate, but as an avenger and emancipator.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 161.

emancipatory (ē-man' si-pā-tō-ri), a. [< emancipate + -ory.] Pertaining or relating to emancipation; favoring or giving emancipation; as, an emancipatory judgment, law, or decree.

The first of these [sources] was the emancipatory spirit of the North.

The Atlantic, LVII, 22.

A woman the most averse to any emancipatory ideas concerning her sex can surely identify her name with that most sexy of occupations, needle work.

Philadelphia Times, July 24, 1883.

emancipist (ē-man' si-pist), n. [< F. émancipiste, < émanciper, emancipate; see emancipate and -ist.] A convict in a European penal colony who has been pardoned or emancipated.

There is much jealousy between the children of the rich emancipist (in New South Wales) and the free settlers.

Darwin, Voyage of Beagle, II, 231.

For some time past the free colonists (in the French penal colonies), by no means a numerous class, have declined to employ emancipists, declaring that while they claimed the free man's wages they would not give the free man's work.

Nineteenth Century, XXI, 830.

emandibulate (ē-man-dib' ū-lāt), a. [< L. e-priv. + mandibula, mandible; see mandibulate.] 1. In entom., having no mandibles, or having those organs so modified that they cannot be used for grasping or biting, as in the Lepidoptera and most Diptera. This epithet was restricted by Kirby to species of the neuropterous family Phryganeidae, in which the mandibles are soft and very minute, but the maxillae and labium are well developed.

2. Having no lower jaw, as the lampreys and hags; cyclostomous, as a vertebrate.

emanet (ē-man'), v. i. [= F. émaner = Sp. Pg. emanar = It. emanare, < L. emanare, flow out, proceed from; see emanate.] To flow out; issue; emanate.

We may seem even to hear the supreme intelligence and eternal soul of all nature give this contribution to the spirit which emanated from him.

Sir W. Jones, Mystical Poetry of the Persians and Hindus.

emang, prep. and adv. An obsolete form of among.

emarcid (ē-mār'sid), a. [Irreg. < L. e- + marcidus, withered, after emarcere, wither away; see marcid.] In bot., flaccid; wilted.

emarginate (ē-mār' jī-nāt), v. t.; pref. and pp. emarginated, ppr. emarginating. [< L. emarginatus, pp. of emarginare, deprive of the edge, < e, out, + margo (margin-), edge, margin; see marginate.] To remove the margin of; deprive of margin.

emarginate (ē-mār' jī-nāt), a. [< L. emarginatus, pp.; see the verb.] Having the margin or extremity taken away. *Specifically (a) In bot., notched at the blunt apex, applied to a leaf, petal, stigma, or to the gills of fungi. (b) In mineral., having all the edges of the primitive form truncated, each by one face. (c) In zool., having the margin broken by a shallow notch or other incursion; indented, nicked.

Some emarginations (of an edition of "Don Quixote") were some Scotchman's.

Gayton, Notes on Don Quixote.

3. The state of being emarginated; effeminacy; unmanly weakness.

emasculator (ē-mas' kŭ-lā-tor), n. [< L. emasculator, < emasculare, emasculate; see emasculate.] One who or that which emasculates.

emasculatory (ē-mas' kŭ-lā-tō-ri), a. [< emasculare + -ory.] Serving to emasculate.

embacer, v. t. See embase.

embalel, emball (em-bāl', -bāl'), v. t.; pref. and pp. embaled, emballed, ppr. embalting, embalting. [< F. emballer (= Sp. Pg. embalar = It. imballare, make into a bale, pack up), < en, in, + bale, ballo, a bale, ball; see bale, ball.] 1. To make up into a bale, bundle, or package; pack.

All the merchandise they laid outwards, they emball it with their hides, so that if it take wet it can have no great harm.

Hakluyt's Voyages, II, 227.

2. To wrap up; inclose.

Her straight legs most bravely were embayl'd

In golden buckles of costly Cornwall.

Spenser, F. Q., II, III, 27.

embalment (em-bāl' mēt), n. [Verbal n. of emball, taken independently as < em- + ball; see embale, emball.] The act of distinguishing by the ball or globe, the ensign of royalty; promotion to sovereignty.

And I swear again, I would not be a queen

For all the world.

Old L., In faith, for little England

You'd venture an emballing. Shak., Hen. VIII., II, 3.

Emballonura (em-bal' ō-nŭ-rā), n. [NL. < Gr. ἐμβάλλω, throw in, + οὐρά, tail.] The typical genus of bats of the family Emballonuridae. The tail perforates the interfemoral membrane and appears loose upon the upper surface for a part of its own length, whence the name. There are 2 incisors and 2 premolars in each half of the upper jaw, and 2 incisors and 2 premolars in each half of the lower jaw. The genus contains a few species, distributed from Madagascar through the Malay archipelago.

emballonurid (em-bal' ō-nŭ-rid), n. A bat of the family Emballonuridae.

Emballonuridae (em-bal' ō-nŭ-ri-dē), n. pl. [NL. < Emballonura + -idae.] A family of microchiropteran bats, containing about 12 genera and upward of 60 species. They are characterized by the obliquely truncated snout with prominent nostrils, the first phalanx of the middle finger folded in repose above the metacarpal bone, and by the production of the tail far beyond the interfemoral membrane, or the perforation of this membrane by the tail. There is generally a single pair of upper incisors. The family is nearly cosmopolitan, and is divided into Emballonurinae and Molossinae.

Emballonurinae (em-bal' ō-nŭ-ri-nē), n. pl. [NL. < Emballonura + -inae.] The subfamily of bats typical of the family Emballonuridae, having a slender tail which either perforates the interfemoral membrane above or ends in it, weak upper incisors, and long legs with slender fibulae. The leading genera are Furia, Emballonura, Diadurum, Noctilio, and Rhinopoma.

emballonurine (em-bal' ō-nŭ-ri-nē), a. and n. 1. a. Of or pertaining to the microchiropteran families Emballonuridae and Phyllostomidae. The emballonurine alliance is one of two series into which the Microchiroptera are divided, having the upper incisors approximated and the tail perforating the interfemoral membrane, or produced beyond it. See respermatine.

2. n. A member of the emballonurine alliance; an emballonurid or phyllostomid.

embalm (em-bām'), v. t. [Formerly also im-balm; spelling altered as in balm; < ME. enbaumen, enbaumen, < OF. enbaumer, earlier enbauser, enbauser, enbauserer, enbauser, etc., < F. enbaumer = Pr. enbaumar, enbaymar = Sp. Pg. embalsamar = It. imbalsamare, imbalsimare, < ML. imbalsamare, < L. in, in, + balsamum, balsam, balm; see balsam, balm.] 1. To dress or anoint with balm; specifically, to preserve from decay by means of balsams or other aromatic species; keep from putrefaction by impregnating with spices, gums, and chemicals, as a dead body. The ancient process was to open the body, remove the viscera, and fill the cavities with antiseptic spices and drugs. (See mummy.) In modern times many substances and methods have been employed in embalming, as by injection of arsenical preparations into the blood-vessels, generally with a view only to the preservation of the body for a certain period, as during transportation to a distant point, or instead of refrigeration in hot weather during the ordinary interval before burial.

Joseph commanded his servants the physicians to embalm his father: and the physicians embalmed Israel.

Gen. 1, 2.

Unto this appertained the ancient use of the Jews to embalm the corpse with sweet odours, and to adorn the sepulchres of certain.

The Lat. imbr-dagur, OSw. ymbren-dagur, Norw. ymbren-dagur, ember-days, Lecl. imbr-nuit, ember night, Lecl. imbr-nika, Norw. imbr-nika, ember-week, are in the first element from the E.; while the equiv. Sw. tamper-dagur, Dan. tamper-dag, also katember, D. quateremper, quateremper, LG. tamper, quater-tamper, G. quaterember, formerly kottember, kottemper, etc., are corruptions of the ML. quater tempora, the four seasons, applied to the ember-days.] Literally, a circuit; a course; specifically, a regular (annual, quarterly, etc.) course; the regular return of a given season; a word now used only in certain compounds, namely, ember-days, -eve, -fast, -tide, -week, and in the derivative embyring. See the etymology.

ember-days (em'ber-dāz), n. pl. [Early mod. E. also amber-dagur; < ME. embyr-dagur, yumber-dagur, earlier umbyr-dagur, < AS. ymbren-dag, pl. -dagas (also simply ymbren), ember-days; see *ember*² and *day*¹.] Days in each of the four seasons of the year set apart by the Roman Catholic and other western liturgical churches for prayer and fasting. They are the Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday after the first Sunday in Lent, after Whit-Sunday, after September 14th, and after December 13th. The weeks in which ember-days fall are called ember-weeks. The Sundays immediately following these seasons are still appointed by the canons of the Anglican Church for the ordination of priests and deacons.

Embernagra (em'ber-nā'), a. [ember + -nā.] Strewed with embers or ashes.

On the white ember'd hearth Heap up fresh fuel. Southey, Joan of Arc, II.

ember-eve (em'ber-ēv), n. The vigil of an ember-day. See eve.

It hath been sung, at festivals, On ember-eves, and holy eves. Shak., Pericles, Prolog. 104.

ember-fast (em'ber-fāst), n. [ember (pot found), < AS. ymbren-fasten: see *ember*² and *fast*³.] The fast observed during the ember-days.

ember-geese (em'ber-gēs), n. [Also (dial.) emmer, imber, imner, ammer-geese; cf. D. ember-egel (D. egel = E. swine), G. imber, < Dan. imber, Sw. imber, imner, Norw. imbr, var. yimber, hymber, hymbrer, Faroic imbrim, Lecl. himbrin, mod. himbrim, the ember-geese.] A name of the great northern diver or loon, Colymbus lar-quatus or Tringator immer.

embyring (em'ber-ing), n. [*embyr*² + -ing.] An ember-day.

Fasting days and embyrings be lent, William, Holyrood, and Lacia. Old rime.

embyring-days (em'ber-ing-dāz), n. pl. The ember-days.

Divers of the king's subjects have of late more than in times past broken and contemned such abstinence, which hath been used in this realm upon the Fridays and Saturdays, the embyring days, and other days commonly called vigils. Quoted by Hallam.

Emberiza (em-be-rī'zā), n. [NL. (Jansson; earlier in Killian, 1604), < G. dial. (Swiss) embitze, emmeritz, equiv. to MLG. emmerin, emmerin, G. emmering, emmerung (= MD. emmerinck), G. also emmering, emmerling (= MD. emmerlinck), a hunting, dial. of OHG. amero, MHG. amer, G. ammer, a hunting, = AS. amere, E. ammer, hammer, in yellowhammer: see yellowhammer.] A genus of buntings, conirostral passerine birds of the family Fringillidae, such as the common corn-bunting of Europe (E. miliaria), the yellow-bunting (E. citrinella), the cir-bunting (E. ciris), the ortolan (E. hortulana), etc. The limits of the genus are indefinite, and the term has no more exact meaning than bunting (which see). In a late restricted sense it includes more than 50 species, confined to the Palearctic, Indian, and Ethiopian regions. Some of the very many North and South American buntings which have been called Emberiza properly belong to this genus. See Emberizina, and cule under bunting and cir-bunting.

Emberizidae (em-be-rī-zī'dā), n. pl. [NL., < Emberiza + -idae.] The buntings rated as a family of conirostral passerine birds.

Emberizinae (em-be-rī-zī-nā), n. pl. [NL., < Emberiza + -inae.] The true buntings rated as a subfamily of Fringillidae. The group is probably inacceptable of zoological definition. It has of late been made one of three subfamilies of Fringillidae (the others being Coccothraustinae and Fringillinae) having the nasal bones short, not extended backward beyond the fore border of the orbit, the mandibular foramen not continuous throughout, leaving a space in the commissural line of the bill, and the gonysial angle well marked. In such acceptance, the Emberizinae include about 50 genera, of most parts of the world, represented by many of the most common buntings, finches, and "sparrows" of English speaking countries, especially of the United States, as the chip, snow, and vesper-bird, lark finch, lark and towhee bunting, black throated bunting, white throated and white-crowned sparrows, field, fox, song, swamp, and savannah sparrows, the long-sparrow, etc. See Emberiza.

emberizine (em-be-rī-zīn), a. [Emberiza, < NL. emberizinus: see Emberiza.] Of or pertaining to the genus Emberiza; related to or resembling a bunting. Courts.

Emberizoides (em'be-rī-zoi'dēs), n. [NL. (C. J. Temminck, 1824), < Emberiza + Gr. oidēs, form.] A notable genus of South American fringilline birds with long acuminate tail feathers, typical species of which are E. macrura and E. sphenura. Also called Tardivola.

Embernagra (em'ber-nā'), n. [NL. (H. P. Lesson, 1831), < Emberiza + (Ta)nagra.] A genus of fringilline birds, related to Pipilo, having green as the principal color, the wings and tail much rounded, of equal length, the tarsus moderate, and the toes short; the American greenfinches. The Texas sparrow or greenfinch is E. ruficapilla, a common species in the lower Rio Grande valley. Also called Lamprolaima.

Lesser Sparrow (Embernagra virentigata)

embertide (em-bér-tid), n. [< ember + tide.] One of the seasons in which ember-days occur.

ember-week (em-bér-wék), n. [< ME. ymber-weke, umbrí-wike, < AS. ymbren-wice: see ember + week.] A week in which ember-days fall.

And are all fallen into fasting days and Ember-weeks, that cooks about of use? Mansueto, The Old Law, III. 1. Constant she keeps in Ember-week and Lent.

embesyt, v. t. Same as embuay. Skellon.

embetter (em-bet-ér), v. t. [< em-1 + better.] To make better.

For cruelly doth not embetter men,
But them more wary make than they have been.
Daniel, Chorus in Philotas.

embezzle (em-bez-í), v. t.; pret. and pp. embezzled, ppr. embezzling. [Early mod. E. (16th cent.) imbezle, imbezle, embesyt, embecyll, embesel, imbesel, imbezil, imbecill, etc., weakon, diminish, flech, < imbecile (accented on 2d syll.), < OF. imbecille, weak, feeble: see imbecile, and cf. bezle.] 1. To weaken; diminish the power or extent of.

And so imbecill all their strengths that they are naught to me.
Brant, tr. of Horace's Satires, I. 6.

The seconde playe of the seconde angel, as the seconde judgement of God against the regiment of Rome, and this is imbezillings and diminishing of their power and dominion, many laudes and people fallinge from them.
J. Udall, Revelations of St. John, xvi.

2. To waste or dissipate in extravagance; misappropriate or mispend.

I do not like that this unthrifty youth should embezzle away the money.
Beau. and Fl., Knight of Burning Pestle, II. 2.

When thou hast embezzled all thy store
Dryden, tr. of Persius's Satires.

3. To steal slyly; purloin; flech; make off with.

A fellow . . . that had embezzled and conveyed away a cup of gold.
J. Udall, tr. of Apophthegms of Erasmus, § 83.

The Jewels, rich apparel, presents, gold, silver, costly furs, and such like, were conveyed away, concealed, and vilerly embezzled.
Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 286.

4. To appropriate fraudulently to one's own use, as what is entrusted to one's care; apply to one's private use by a breach of trust, as a clerk or servant who misappropriates his employer's money or valuables.

He accused several citizens who had been entrusted with public money with embezzling it. J. Adams, Works, V. 25.

5. To confuse; amaze.

They came where Saucha was, astonished and embezzled with what he heard and saw.

Shelton, tr. of Don Quixote (1652), fol. 158, back.

embezzlement (em-bez-í-ment), n. [< embezzle + -ment.] The act of embezzling; specifically, the act by which a clerk, servant, or other person occupying a position of trust fraudulently appropriates to his own use the money or goods entrusted to his care; a criminal conversion; the appropriation to one's self by a breach of trust of the property or money of another; "a sort of statutory larceny, committed by servants and other like persons where there is a trust reposed, and therefore no trespass, so that the act would not be larceny at the common law" (Bishop).

To remove doubts which had existed respecting embezzlements by merchants and bankers' clerks, it was enacted, by the 39 George III. ch. 86, that if any servant or clerk should by virtue of his employment receive any money, bills, or any valuable security, goods or effects, in the name or on the account of his master or employer, and should afterwards embezzle any part of the same, he shall be deemed to have feloniously stolen the same, and should be subject to transportation for any term not exceeding fourteen years.

Blackstone, Com., IV. xvii., note 3.

Embezzlement is distinguished from larceny, properly so called, as being committed in respect of property which is not, at the time, in the actual or legal possession of the owner.

embleser (em-bez-í-er), n. One who embles.

Embia (em-bí-á), n. [NL.] The typical genus of the family Embiidae. A. sargisii is an Egyptian species.

embide (em-bí-id), n. One of the Embiidae.

Embiidae (em-bí-id-é), n. pl. [NL., < Embia + -idae.] A small family of neuropterous (pseudoneuropterous) insects, of the group Orthoptera, related to the Proctidae, characterized by the narrow depressed body, head distinct from the thorax, many-jointed moniliform antennae, 3-jointed tarsi, and few-veined wings of equal size. They are small phytophagous insects; their larvae are found under stones in silted galleries. By some they are referred to the Orthoptera. The leading genera are Embia, Olyntia, and Oligotoma. Also written Embide.

embillow (em-bí-ló), v. t. [< em-1 + billow.] To heave, as the waves of the sea; swell. [Rare.]

And then embillowed high doth in his pride disdain
With foam and roaring din all hugeness of the maine.
Lisle, tr. of Du Bartas's First Booke of Nue.

Embiotoca (em-bí-ot-á-ká), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐπι-βίω, being in life, living (< ἐν, in, + βίω, life), + τίτω, τίκω, bring forth (> τίω, offspring).] The typical genus of the family Embiotocidae. L. Agassiz, 1853.

embiotocid (em-bí-ot-á-id), n. One of the Embiotocidae.

Embiotocidae (em-bí-ot-á-id-é), n. pl. [NL., < Embiotoca + -idae.] A family of viviparous acanthopterygian fishes, related to the labroids; the surf-fishes, in the widest sense. They are of ordinary compressed oval form, like the white perch, and have cycloid scales, lateral line continuous and parallel with the back, head and mouth small, with jaw teeth only, the single dorsal fin 8- to 18 spined, folding into a groove in the back, and the anal fin long and 3-spined. They are mostly small fishes, the largest only 18 inches long, the smallest 4 or 5. All are viviparous, a remarkable fact first made known to science in 1853, 10 to 20 young are born at a litter. Nearly all are marine, abounding on the Pacific coast of the United States, where they are among the inferior food-fishes, and are called perches, porgies, shiners, etc. About 20 species, referred to about a dozen genera, are now known. Of these species 17 are confined to the Pacific coast waters of North America, and one is peculiar to the fresh waters of California. The marine species belong to the subfamily Embiotocinae, the fresh-water species to the subfamily Heterocarpinae. The family has also been called Ditremitidae, Ditremitidae, Holconidae, and Holconidae. See cut under Ditremitidae.

Embiotocinae (em-bí-ot-á-id-é), n. pl. [NL., < Embiotoca + -inae.] The surf-fishes proper, or marine embiotocids, the typical subfamily of Embiotocidae, with the spinous portion of the dorsal shorter than the soft part, and having only from 8 to 11 spines.

embiotocine (em-bí-ot-á-id-é), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Embiotocinae.

II. n. A fish of the subfamily Embiotocinae.

embiotocoid (em-bí-ot-á-id-é), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Embiotocidae.

II. n. A viviparous fish of the family Embiotocidae; one of the surf-fishes.

embitter (em-bit-ér), v. t. [Formerly also im-bitter; < em-1 + bitter.] 1. To make bitter or more bitter. [Rare in the literal sense.]

One grain of bad embitters all the best.
Dryden, Illad, I. 775.

2. To affect with bitterness or unhappiness; make distressful or grievous; as, the sins of youth often embitter old age.

Is there anything that more embitters the enjoyments of this life than shame? South, Sermons.

Stern Powers who make their care
To embitter human life, malignant Deities.
M. Arnold, Empedocles on Etna.

To open the door of escape to those who live in contention would not necessarily embitter the relations of those who are happy.
N. A. Rev., CXXXIX. 340.

3. To render more violent or malignant; exacerbate.

Men, the most embittered against each other by former contests. Hancroft.

embitterer (em-bit-ér-ér), n. One who or that which embitters.

The fear of death has always been considered as the greatest enemy of human quiet, the polluter of the feast of happiness, and the embitterer of the cup of joy. Johnson.

embitterment (em-bit-ér-ment), n. [< embitter + -ment.] The act of embittering.

The commotions, terrors, expectations, and embitterments of repentance.

Plutarch, Morals (trans.), IV. 155 (Ord MS.).

embranch (em-blanch-), v. t. [< ME. em-branchen, < OF. embranchier, "embranchir, em-blanchir, whiten, < en- + blanchir, whiten, < blanc, white: see en- and blanch.] To whiten.

It was impossible that a spot of dyed dye should be embranch'd.
Hopkins, Life of Land, p. 200.

emblaze (em-bláz-), v. t.; pret. and pp. emblaz'd, ppr. emblazing. [< em-1 + blaze.] 1.

To kindle; set in a blaze.

Works dam'd, or to be dam'd (your father's fault)!
O, purified by flames, ascend the sky. . . .
Not sulphur dipp'd, emblaze an alchouse fire.
Pope, Dunciad, I. 226.

2. To adorn with "glittering embellishments; cause to glitter or shine.

The embraz'd diamonds
Would so embraz the forehead of the deep,
And so beset with stars, that they below
Would grow inured to light. Milton, Comus, l. 732.
No weeping orphan saw his father's stores
Our shrines irradiate, or embraz the floors.
Pope, Epistle to Abolard, l. 128.

And forked flames embraz the blackening storm.
J. Barlow, Vision of Columbus, viii.

3. To display or set forth conspicuously or ostentatiously; blazon.

But thou shalt wear it as a herald's coat,
To embraz the honour that thy master got.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., IV. 10.

Emblaz'd his trophies on two posts of brass.
Greene, Orlando Furioso.

emblazon (em-bláz-zon), v. [< em-1 + blazon.]

I. trans. 1. To adorn with figures of heraldry or ensigns armorial; as, a shield emblazoned with armorial bearings.

Boys paraded the streets, bearing banners emblazoned with the arms of Aragon. Prescott, Ferd. and Is., I. 3.

2. To depict or represent, as an armorial ensign on a shield.

My shield, . . .
On which when Cupid, with his killing bow
And cruel shafts, emblazon'd she beheld,
At sight thereof she was with terror quaild.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. x. 55.

3. To set off with ornaments; decorate; illuminate.

Fire heaven's emblazon'd by the rosy dawn,
Domestic cares awake him. J. Philips, Cider, II.
The walls were . . . emblazoned with legends in commemoration of the illustrious pair. Prescott.

Those stories of courage and sacrifice which emblazon the annals of Greece and Rome. Sumner, Orations, I. 11.

4. To celebrate in laudatory terms; sing the praises of.

We find Augustus . . . emblazoned by the poets.
Hakewell, Apology.

Heroes emblazoned high to fame.
Longfellow, tr. of Copias de Manrique.

You whom the fathers made free and defended,
Stain not the scroll that emblazons their fame!
O. W. Holmes, Never or Now.

II. intrans. To blaze forth; shine out.

Th' englad'd spring, forgetful now to weep,
Began t' emblazon from her leavy bed.
G. Fletcher, Christ's Triumph after Death.

emblazoner (em-bláz-zon-ér), n. 1. One who emblazons; a herald.—2. A decorator; an illuminator; one who practices ornamentation.

I step again to this emblazoner of his title-page, . . . and here I find him pronouncing, without reprieve, those animadversions to be a slanderous and scurrilous libel.

Milton, Apology for Smectymnua.

emblazonment (em-bláz-zon-ment), n. [< emblazon + -ment.] 1. The act of emblazoning.

—2. That which is emblazoned. Imp. Dict.

emblazony (em-bláz-zon-ry), n. [< emblazon + -ry.] 1. The act or art of emblazoning.—2. Heraldic decoration, as pictures or figures upon shields, standards, etc.

Who saw the Banner reared on high
In all its dread emblazony.

Wordsworth, White Doe of Rylstone, III.

Thine ancient standard's rich emblazony.
Abp. Trench, Gibraltar.

emblem (em-blem), n. [= D. emblem = G. Dan. Sw. emblem; < OF. emblemme, F. emblème = Sp. Pg. emblem = It. emblem, < L. emblem, pl. emblemata, raised ornaments on vessels, tessellated work, mosaic, < Gr. ἐμβλημα (-), an insertion (L. sense not recorded in Gr.), < ἐμβάλλω, put in, lay on, < ἐν, in, + βάλλω, cast, throw, put.] 1. That which is put in or on in-laid work; inlay; inlaid or mosaic work; something ornamental inserted in another body.

Underfoot the violet,
Crocus, and hyacinth, with rich inlay
Broiler'd the ground, more colour'd than with stone
Of costliest emblem. Milton, P. L., IV. 702.

2. A symbolical design or figure with explanatory writing; a design or an image suggesting some truth or fact; the expression of a thought or idea both in design and in words; as, Quaker's Emblems (a collection of such representations).

Emblem reduceth conceits intellectual to images sensible.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 232.

3. Any object whose predominant quality symbolizes something else, as another quality, condition, state, and the like; the figure of such an object used as a symbol; an allusive figure; a symbol; as, a white robe is an emblem of purity; a balance, of justice; a crown, of royalty.

The emblem is one during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries are sometimes hard to discriminate from the device; for these, as adopted by men of distinction, were commonly emblematic. See device, 7.

Know ye the land where the cypress and myrtle
Are emblems of deeds that are done in their clime?
Byron, Bride of Abydos, l. 1.

A fit emblem, both of the events in memory of which it is raised, and of the gratitude of those who have reared it.
D. Webster, Speech, Bunker Hill, June 17, 1825.

4. An example. [Rare.]

(Lord's Day) Comes Mr. Herbert, Mr. Bonwood's man, and dined with me—a very honest, plain, and well-meaning man. I think him to be; and, by his discourse and manner of life, the true emblem of an old ordinary serving-man.
Peppis, Diary, II. 159.

—Byron, 2 and 3. Emblem, Symbol, Type. Emblem and symbol refer to tangible objects; type may refer also to an act, as when the lifting up of the brazen serpent (Num. xxi. 8, 9) is said to be a type of the crucifixion, the serpent being a type or emblem of Christ. A symbol is generally an emblem which has become recognized or standard among men; a volume proposing new signs of this sort would be called a "book of emblems"; but an emblem may be a symbol, as the bread and wine at the Lord's supper are more often called emblems than symbols of Christ's death. Symbol is by this rule the appropriate word for the conventional signs in mathematics. Emblem is most often used of moral and religious matters, and type chiefly of religious doctrines, institutions, historical facts, etc. Type in its religious application generally points forward to an antitype.

Rose of the desert! thou art to me
An emblem of stainless purity.
D. M. Blair, The White Rose.

All things are symbols—the external shows
Of nature have their image in the mind
Longfellow, The Harvest Moon.

Beauty was lent to Nature as the type
Of heaven's unspeakable and holy joy.
S. J. Hale, Beauty.

emblem (em'blem), v. t. [< emblem, n.] To represent or suggest by an emblem or symbolically; symbolize; emblemize. [Rare.]

Why may he not be emblem'd by the cozening fig tree that our Saviour curseth?
Pittman, Reveries, l. 30.

emblems (em-b'lemz), n.; pl. emblemata (-māt-ā). [L.: see emblem.] In archeol.: (a) An insaid emblem or ornament; an ornament in mosaic. (b) An ornament in relief made of some precious metal, fastened upon the surface of a vessel or an article of furniture.

In another class of jewels animals or the human figure were not relieved on a ground, but embossed and cut out in outline, like the emblemata of later Greek art.
C. T. Newton, Art and Archeol., p. 208.

emblematic, emblematical (em-ble-mat'ik, -i-kal), a. [= F. emblématique = Sp. emblemático = Pg. It. emblematico (cf. D. G. emblematisch = Dan. Sw. emblematisk); < L. as if emblematicus*, < emblemata; see emblem.] 1. Pertaining to or constituting an emblem; using or dealing in emblems; symbolic.

And wet his brow with hallowed wine,
And on his finger given to shine
The emblematic gem
Scott, Marmion, IV. 8.

And so, because the name (like many names) can be made to yield a fanciful emblematic meaning, Homer must be a myth.
De Quincey, Homer, l.

2. Representative by some allusion or customary association; suggestive through similarity of qualities or conventional significance: as, a crown is emblematic of royalty; whiteness in emblematic of purity.

Glanced at the legendary Amazon
As emblematic of a nobler age.
Tennyson, Princess, II.

emblematically (em-ble-mat'ik-ly), adv. In an emblematic way; by way or means of emblems; in the manner of emblems; by way of allusive representation.

Others have spoken emblematically and hieroglyphically; and so did the Egyptians, unto whom the phoenix was the hieroglyphic of the sun.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., III. 12.

He took a great stone and put it up under the oak, emblematically joining the two great elements of masonry.
Swift.

emblematicness (em-ble-mat'ik-ness), n. The character of being emblematic. Bailey, 1737.

emblematicize (em-ble-mat'iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. emblematicized, ppr. emblematicizing. [< emblematic + -ize.] To represent by or embody in an emblem; emblemize. [Rare.]

He (Giacomo Amigoni) drew the queen and the three eldest princesses, and prints were taken from his pictures, which he generally endeavored to emblematicize by gentils and captives.
Walpole, Anecdotes of Painting, IV. 3.

emblematicist (em'blem-a-tist), n. [< L. emblematicus, < emblem + -ist.] A writer or an inventor of emblems.

Thus began the descriptions of griffins, basilisks, phoenix, and many more; which emblematicists and heralds have decorated with significations answering their institutions.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., v. 25.

Albino, the famous lawyer and emblematicist.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 132.

emblematic (em'blem-a-tik), v. t.; pret. and pp. emblematicized, ppr. emblematicizing. [< L. emblematicus, < emblem + -ic.] To represent or express by means of an emblem: as, to emblematicize a thought, a quality, or the like.

Anciently the sun was emblematicized by a starry figure.
Byr. Hurd, Marks of Imitation.

emblemment (em'ble-ment), n. [< OF. emblament, emblaiement, emblagement, crop, harvest, < emblae, emblere, emblaiier, emblayer, also em-blader (also, without prefix, blae, bler, blayer), F. emblaver (= It. imbuiare), < ML. imbulare, sow with grain, < L. in, in + ML. bladam (> OF. ble, bler, bles, bled, F. blé, blé = Pr. blat = It. biado, biada), grain (orig. crop, as that which is taken away), orig. ablatus*, neut. of L. ablatu, pp. of auferre, carry away; see ablativ.] 1. pl. In law, those annual agricultural products which demand culture, as distinguished from those which grow spontaneously; crops which require annual planting, or, like hops, annual training and culture. Emblemments thus include corn, potatoes, and most garden vegetables, but not fruits, and generally not grass. They are deemed personal property, and pass as such to the executor or administrator of the occupier, instead of going with the land to his heir, if he die before he has cut, reaped, or harvested them; they also belong to the tenant when his tenancy has been terminated by an unexpected event without his agency, as by his death or that of his landlord.

If a tenant for his own life sows the lands, and dies before harvest, his executors shall have the emblemments or profits of the crop.
Blackstone, Com., II. 8.

2. The right to such crops. Emblemmens Act, an English statute of 1851 (14 and 15 Vict. c. 24), which enacted that, instead of having a right to emblemments, a tenant under a tenant for life, on the determination of the tenancy, shall hold until the expiration of the then current year; that growing crops sowed under execution shall be liable for accruing rent; that the tenant may remove his improvements unless the landlord elect to take them; and that in case a title-rent charge is unpaid the landlord may pay it and recover as on a simple contract.

emblemise (em'ble-miz), v. t.; pret. and pp. emblemized, ppr. emblemizing. [< emblem + -ize.] Same as emblematicize. Also spelled emblemise.

wood, 1833), also improp. Embolimus, < Gr. ἐμβολισμός, inserted, interpolated: see embolism.] A genus of parasitic hymenopterous insects, of the family Proctotrypidae, typical of the subfamily Emboliminae, characterized by the antennal scape, which is shorter than the first joint of the funicle. One North American and two European species are known. Usually spelled Embolismus.

embolism (em-bō-lizm), n. [= F. embolisme = Sp. Pg. embolismo, < LL. embolismus, intercalation (also as adj. intercalary, an error for embolismus), as if < Gr. ἐμβολισμός, < ἐμβολισμός, < Gr. ἐμβολισμός, < LL. embolismus], inserted, intercalated (cf. ἐμβολισμός, something thrown or thrust in: see embolus, 2). < ἐμβολισμός, throw in, put in, insert: see embolus.] 1. Intercalation; the insertion of days, months, or years in an account of time. The Greeks made use of the lunar year of 354 days, and to adjust it to the solar year of 365 days they added a lunar month every second or third year, which they called ἐμβολισμός, or μηνὲς ἐμβολισμῶν, intercalated month.—2. In pathol., the obstruction of a vessel by a clot of fibrin or other substance abnormally present and brought into the current of the circulating medium from some more or less distant locality. Embolism commonly causes paralysis in the brain, with more or less of an apoplectic shock.—4. In liturgies, a prayer for deliverance from evil, inserted in almost all liturgies after the Lord's Prayer, as an expansion of or addition to its closing petition, whence the name. Also embolismus.

Also embolia.

embolismal (em-bō-liz-māl), a. [embolism + -al.] Pertaining to intercalation; intercalated; inserted: as, an embolismal month.

embolismatic, embolismatical (em-bō-liz-mat'ik, -i-kāl), a. [Irreg. < embolism + -atic, -al. The Lat. form ἐμβολισμῶν means 'a patch'.] Embolismic. Scott.

embolismic, embolismical (em-bō-liz-mik, -i-kāl), a. [embolism + -ic, -ical.] Pertaining to or formed by intercalation or insertion; intercalated; inserted; embolic.

Twelve lunations form a common year, and thirteen the embolismic year. Græzer, China (trans.)

The [Hebrew] year is luni solar, and, according as it is ordinary or embolismic, consists of twelve or thirteen lunar months, each of which has 29 or 30 days. Encyc. Brit., IV. 677.

embolismus (em-bō-liz-mus), n. [LL. embolismus, insertion, intercalation: see embolism.] Same as embolism, 4.

The Lord's Prayer is followed, in almost all Liturgies, by a short petition against temptation, . . . which . . . was anciently known by the name of the Embolismus. J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, I. 514.

embolite (em-bō-līt), n. [Gr. ἐμβολή, an insertion (< ἐμβάλλειν, throw in, insert), + -ite.] A mineral consisting chiefly of the chlorid of silver and the bromide of silver, found in Chili and Mexico: so called because intermediate between cerargyrite and bromyrite.

embolium (em-bō-lī-um), n.; pl. embolia (-ā). [NL., < Gr. ἐμβόλιον, something thrown in, < ἐμβάλλειν, throw in: see embolus.] An outer or marginal part of the corium found in the hemelytra of certain heteropterous insects. It resembles the rest of the corium in consistence, and is separated from it only by a thickened rib or vein.

Embolomeri (em-bō-lōm-ē-rī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of embolomerus: see embolomerous.] An order of extinct amphibians, having a set of vertebral centra interposed between the regular vertebral bodies, so that each vertebral arch has two centra, whence the name.

embolomerism (em-bō-lōm-ē-rizm), n. [embolomerus + -ism.] Formation of the vertebral column by means of intercentra between the centra; diplospondylism.

embolomerous (em-bō-lōm-ē-rus), a. [NL. embolomerus, < Gr. ἐμβολικός, thrown in, + μέρος, part.] Thrown in, as intercalated centra or intercentra, between arch-bearing bodies of the vertebrae of the spinal column; having intercentra, as a spinal column; diplospondylic.

The caudal region is embolomerous.

E. D. Cope, Geol. Mag., II. 627.

embolon, embolum (em-bō-lon, -lum), n.; pl. embola (-lā). [L. embolum, < Gr. ἐμβόλον, neut., ἐμβόλος, muse., the bronze beak or ram of a ship: see embolus.] 1. The beak of an ancient war-ship. It was made of metal, in various forms, and sharpened like the prow of a modern ram, so that it might pierce an enemy's vessel beneath the water-line.

Embolon — Ulysses and the Sirens, from Greek red-figured hydria found at Vulci. (From "Monumenti dell' Instituto".)

2. Same as embolus.

embolophasia (em-bō-lō-fā-zī-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐμβολος, thrown in, + φάσις, a saying, < φασις = L. fari, speak.] In rhét., the interjection into discourse of meaningless and usually more or less sonorous words.

embolum, n. See embolus.

embolus (em-bō-lus), n.; pl. emboli (-lī). [L., the piston of a pump, < Gr. ἐμβόλος, muse., ἐμβόλος, neut., anything pointed so as to thrust in easily, a peg, stopper, etc., prep. an adj., thrown or thrust in, or that may be thrown or thrust in, < ἐμβάλλειν, thrust in, throw in, < ἐν, in, + βάλλειν, throw.] 1. Something inserted into or acting within something else; that which thrusts or drives, as a piston or wedge.—2. The clot of fibrin obstructing a blood-vessel, causing embolism: as, capillary emboli.—3. The nucleus emboliformis of the cerebellum.

Also embolon, embolum.

emboly (em-bō-lī), n. [Gr. ἐμβολή, insertion, < ἐμβάλλειν, throw in: see embolus.] In embryol., that mode of invagination by which a vesicular morula or blastosphere becomes a gastrula. It may be illustrated by the process of tacking half of a hollow India-rubber ball into the other half, and is effected by the more or less complete inclusion of the hypoblastic blastomeres within the epiblastic blastomeres, with the result of the diminution or abolition of the original blastocoele, the formation of an archenteron or primitive alimentary cavity with an orifice of invagination or blastopore, and thus the formation of a two-layered germ whose double walls consist of a hypoblastic endoderm and an epiblastic ectoderm, which is therefore a gastrula.

embondage (em-bon-dāj), v. t. [em-bō + bondage.] To reduce to bondage; enslave.

If the devil might have his free option, I believe he would ask nothing else but liberty to enfranchise all false Religions, and to embondage the true. N. Ward, Simple Coder, p. 4.

embonpoint (on-bōn-pwā'), n. [F., fullness, plumpness; orig. a phrase en bon point, in good condition: en, in; bon, good; point, point, degree, condition: see tail, bonus, and point.] Exaggerated plumpness; rotundity of figure; stoutness: a euphemism for fattiness or fleshiness.

A clearness of skin almost bloom, and a plumpness almost embonpoint, softened the decided lines of her features. Charlotte Brontë, The Professor, xviii.

The Queen (Victoria) was not very tall, but . . . until embonpoint overtook her, her figure was exquisitely beautiful. Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLII. 288.

emborder (em-bōr-dēr), v. t. [Formerly also imborder; < em-bō + border. Cf. OF. emborder, border, < em-bō + bord, border.] 1. To furnish, inclose, or adorn with a border.—2. To place as in a border; arrange as a border.

Thick woven arboreal and flowers

Imbordered on each bark. Milton, P. L., ix. 434.

embordered (em-bōr-dērd), p. a. [Formerly also imbordered (in heraldry also embordured); pp. of emborder, v.] Adorned with a border; specifically, in her., having a border: an epithet used only when the border is of the same tincture as the field.

Formed of or furnished with bosses or raised figures: as, embossed leather; embossed writing.—2. In bot., projecting in the center like the boss or umbo of a round shield or target.—3. Swollen; puffed up.

All the embossed sores, and headed evils,
That thou with licence of free foot hast caught,
Wouldst thou disgorge into the general world,
Shak., As you like it, II. 7.

4. In entom., having several plane tracts of any shape elevated above the rest of the surface: said of the sculpture of insects.—5. In glass-decoration, grained.—6. [The particular allusion in this use is uncertain; perhaps to the bubbles of foam which "emboss," as it were, the animal's mouth, or else to its puffed cheeks. See the extract from the "Babe's Book" under emboss.] Foaming at the mouth and panting, as from exhaustion with running: a hunting term formerly applied to dogs and beasts of the chase.

Among yppon as she these wordis said,
Ther come an hert in att the chamber dore
All embosd.
Gensericus (E. E. T. 8.), l. 80.
Like dastard Curres that, having at a bay
The salvage beast embosd in wearie chase, Dare not adventure on the stubborne pray.
No byte before.
Spenser, F. Q., III. i. 22.

Huntaman, I charge thee, tender well my hounds:
Brach Merriman, the poor cur is embosd.
Shak., T. of the 8., Ind., i.

Embossed velvet. Same as raised velvet (which see, under velvet).

embosser (em-bos'er), n. One who or that which embosses; something used for producing raised figures or impressions.

The first form of Morse recorder was the Embosser.
Preece and Siverwright, Telegraphy, p. 67.

embossing (em-bos'ing), n. [Verbal n. of emboss, v.] 1. The art or process of producing raised or projecting figures or designs in relief upon surfaces. A common method of embossing upon a wooden surface is by driving a blunt tool into the wood according to the desired pattern, then planing the surface down to the level of the sunken design, and afterward wetting it. The moisture causes the compressed portions forming the design to rise to their original height, and thus to project from the planed surface. Embossing on leather, paper, or cloth, as for book-covers, books for the blind, and various kinds of ornamental work, and also on metal, is usually effected by stamping with dies by means of an embossing-press, or the bookbinders' arming-press. Embossing with the needle is done either by working over a pad made of cloth, sometimes in several thicknesses, or by stuffing with wool, hair, or the like, under the threads, as in cuched work. See embossing-machine.

2. A raised figure or design; an embossment. [Rare.]

For so letters, if they be so farre off as they cannot be discerned, shew but as a duskyish paper; and all engravings and embossings appear plain.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 878.

embossing-iron (em-bos'ing-i'ern), n. A tool employed to produce a grained surface on marble.

embossing-machine (em-bos'ing-ma-shén'), n. 1. A system of heated rolls, the faces of which are cut with an ornamental design, used to impress the design on figured velvets and other fabrics.—2. A machine for ornamenting wood-surfaces by pressing hot molds upon the wet wood and burning in the pattern, the charcoal being afterward removed. In some machines engraved rolls are used in place of stamps, and the wood is stamped and passed between the rolls while hot.—3. A machine for embossing an ornamental design on boot- and shoe-fronts.

embossing-press (em-bos'ing-pres), n. An apparatus for stamping and embossing paper, cardboard, book-covers, leather, etc., and for erasing checks by destroying the texture of the paper on which they are written.

embossment (em-bos'ment), n. [emboss + -ment.] 1. The act of embossing or forming protuberances or knobs upon a surface; the state of being embossed or studded.—2. A prominence like a boss; a knob or jutting point.

I wish, also, in the very middle, a fair mount, with three accents and alleys, . . . which I would have to be perfect circles, without any bulwarks or embossments.
Bacon, Gardens (ed. 1887).

3. Relief; raised work.

The gold embossment might indeed have been done by another, but not these heads, so true to the life, and of an art so far beyond any ability of mine, that I am tempted sometimes to think that he is in league with Vulcan.
W. Ware, Zenobia, I. 65.

The admission ticket for the City festival was a rich embossment from a specially cut die in the old French style of Louis XIV. First Year of a Saken Re-em, p. 64, note.

embottlet (em-bot'let), v. t. [em-1 + botth 2.] To put in a bottle; confine in a bottle, bottle.

Ström, firmest fruit, Embottled (long as Priam's Troy Withstood the Greeks) endures, etc. justly mild
J. Philips, Cider, II.

embouchure (on-bō-shür'), n. [F., < emboucher, put into the mouth, refl. flow out, discharge; see embogue.] 1. The mouth of a river, etc.; the point of discharge of a flowing stream.

We approached Pitea at sunset. The view over the broad embouchure of the river, studded with islands, was quite picturesque.
B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 180.

At the entrance to Wolstenholme Sound, which, like most of these inlets, forms the embouchure of a glacier river.
Schlegel and Saley, Review of Greece, p. 6.

2. A mouthpiece. Specifically (a) The metal mounting of the opening of a purse. (b) In music (1) The mouthpiece of a wind-instrument, especially when of metal. (2) The adjustment of the mouth of the player to such a mouthpiece. The intonation of certain instruments, such as the French horn, depends largely upon the player's embouchure.

embound (em-bound'), v. t. [em-1 + bound 1.] To shut in; inclose.

That sweet breath,
Which was embounded in this beautiful day Shak., K. John, IV. 3.

embow (em-bō'), v. t. [Formerly also imbow; < em-1 + bow 2.] To form like a bow; arch; bend; bow. [Archaic.]

To take, grasp, clasp, or fold in the arms; used absolutely, to press to the bosom, as in token of affection; hug; clasp.

And but as he embrac'd his horse necke he hadde fallen to the erthe all vp-right.
Morte (E. E. T. 8.), II. 821.
Sir, I think myself happy in your acquaintance; and before we part, shall entreat leave to embrace you.
Cotton, in Walton's Angler, II. 225.

Strong Son of God, immortal Love,
Whom we, that have not seen thy face,
By faith, and faith alone, embrace.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, lxx.

He took his place upon the double throne,
She cast herself before him on her knees,
Embracing him.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 412.

2. To inclose; encompass; contain; encircle.

embroider (em-broi'dér), v. t. [Formerly also embroider, embroder, embroder; extended with -er, as in broider, q. v., after broidery, embroidery, from earlier embroid.] 1. To decorate with ornamental needlework. See embroidery.
His garment was disguised very wayne,
And his embroidered Bonnet sat awry.
Spenser, F. Q., III. xii. 9
Thou shalt embroider the coat of blue linen
Ex. xxviii. 30
Some embroidered with white beads, some with Copper,
Other painted after their manner.
Capt. John Smith, True Travels, l. 130.

2. To work with the needle upon a ground; produce or form in needlework, as a flower, a cipher, etc.: as, to embroider silver stars on velvet.

The whole Chappell covered on the outside with cloth of Tissue: the gift, as appeareth by the arms embroidered thereon, of the Florentine.
Sandys, Travels, p. 132.

3. Figuratively, to embellish; decorate with verbal or literary ornament; hence, to falsify or exaggerate: as, the story has been considerably embroidered.

None of his writings are so agreeable to us as his Letters, particularly those which are written with earnestness, and are not embroidered with verses.
Macaulay, Frederic the Great.

embroiderer (em-broi'dér-ér), n. One who embroiders, in any sense of the word.

Their embroiderers are very singular workmen, who work much in gold and silver.
Coryat, Crudities, l. 122

I am ashamed thus to employ my pen in correcting this embroiderer, who has stuffed his writings with so many lies that those who bear him the least ill will are forced to blush at his suppers and toys.
North, Life of Qvoniamber embroidery (em-broi'dér-i), n.; pl. embroideries (-iz). [embroider, after broidery.] 1.

The art of working with the needle raised and ornamental designs in threads of silk, cotton, gold, silver, or other material, upon any woven fabric, leather, paper, etc. Embroidery has been used in all ages for the decoration of hangings and garments used for statues of divinities or in religious ceremonies; but its use in ordinary dress was especially developed during the middle ages in Europe, when garments entirely ornamented with the needle were worn by those who could afford them, and heraldry offered an opportunity for embroidery upon the surcoats and tabards of men-at-arms. The nations of Persia and the extreme East are the greatest masters of embroidery in modern times. The example most familiar to the West is the India shawl, for which see cashmere and chudder.

2. A design produced or worked according to this art.

Next these a youthful train their vows express d,
With feathers crown d, with gay embroidery dress d
Pope, Temple of Fame

They wore cloaks of the richest material covered with lace and embroidery; corked shoes, pantofles, or slippers, ornamented to the utmost of their means, and this extreme ragsauce was anxiously followed by men of all classes.
Fairholt, l. 250.

3. Variegated or diversified ornamentation, especially by the contrasts of figures and colors; ornamental decoration.

As if she contended to have the embroidery of the earth richer than the cope of the sky B. Jonson, The Penates
If the natural embroidery of the meadows were help'd and improved by art, a man might make a pretty land skip of his own possessions.
Spectator, No. 414

4. In her., a hill or mount with several copings or rises and falls. — Canadian, chain-stitch, chemise, cloth, cordovan embroidery. See the qualifying words. — Out-cloth embroidery, a kind of embroidery in which pieces of cloth cut in the shape of leaves, flowers, etc., are sewed upon a foundation, the whole being assisted by decorative edging lines and the like in needlework. See appliqué, and cloth appliqué, under cloth. — Danish embroidery. See Danish. — Darned embroidery, a kind of embroidery in which a background of a somewhat open textile fabric is filled in by the needle with new threads, so as to make a solid and opaque surface in the form of the design. This is especially used for washable materials, such as muslin for curtains. — Stitching-embroidery. See stitching.

embroidery-frame (em-broi'dér-i-frám), n. A frame on which material to be embroidered is fastened and stretched, so that it may not be drawn in the working.

embroidery-needle (em-broi'dér-i-né'dl), n. Any one of various large needles or implements of like character used in ornamental needlework and similar processes. The chenille embroidery-needle has a large open eye and a sharp point; the worsted or wool-work needle, for use with canvas, is usually blunt, and has the eye nearly as large as in the former. For embroidery on solid materials the needle is thin and sharp, and has a long narrow eye; for crochet and tambour-work the so-called needle is in reality a hook.

embroidery-paste (em-broi'dér-i-pást), n. An adhesive mixture used in embroidery to make materials adhere together, and also to stiffen the embroidery at the back. Dict. of Needlework.

embroid¹ (em-broi'), v. t. [em-1 + broid¹. Appar. confused with embroid².] To broid; burn.

Merry diseases, seated in the spirit, embroid the whole frame of the body.
A. Ward, Simplet obler, p. 7.

That knowledge for which we boldly attempt to rifle God's cabinet should, like the coal from the altar, serve only to embroid and consume the sacrilegious invaders.
Deacy of Christian Piety embroid² (em-broi'), v. t. [OF embrouiller, embrouiller, embrouiller, become troubled, confused, or soiled, later and mod F. embrouiller (= Sp. embrollar = Pg. embrothar = It. embrogliare, entangle, confuse, embroll, en- + brouiller, confuse, jumble: see broid².] 1. To mix up or entangle; intermix confusedly; involve. [Rare in this literal use.]

Omitted paragraph embroid d the senses.
With vain traditions stopp'd the gaping fence
Dryden, Reliquia Tacti, l. 200
The Christian antiquities at Rome are *embroid*ed with fable and legend
Addison
2. To involve in contention or trouble by discord; disturb; distract.
I had no design to embroid my kingdom in civil war
Edison, Hamlet

It pleas'd God not to embroid and put to confusion his whole people for the perverseness of a few Milton, Eikonoklastes, xvi

I verily believe it is the sad inequality of intellect that prevails that embroids communities more than any thing else
Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 161

embroid² (em-broi'), n. [embroid², v.] Perplexity; confusion; embarrassment. Shaytesbury.

What an embroid it had made in Parliament is not easy to conjecture embroilment (em-broi'ment), n. [OF (and F.) embrouillement (= Pg. embrouilhamento = It. embrogliamento, embrouiller, embroll, see embroid² and -ment.] The act of embroiding, or the state of being embroided; a state of contention, perplexity, or confusion; disturbance; entanglement.
Roop North, Examen, p. 168

He [the Prince of Orange] was not apprehensive of a new embroilment, but rather wished it
Sp. Burnet, Hist. Own Times, an. 1678

As minister to England during the war he [Adams] had largely contributed by his fitness and discretion to save the country from a foreign embroilment.
G. S. Merwin, 8 Bowles, II 150

embronze (em-bronz'), v. t. [em-1 + bronz.] To form or represent in bronze, as a statue.

Will you in largeness exhaust your store
That you may proudly stalk the Circus over,
Or in the Capitol embronze d may stand
Spoil'd of your fortune and paternal land?
Francis Tr. of Horace a Satiro, II

embrothel (em-broth'el), v. t. [em-1 + brothel².] To inclose or harbor in a brothel. [Rare.]

Men which choose
Law practice for mere gain boldly repute
Worse than embrothel d strumpets prostitute Donne

embrowdet, embrowdet, v. t. Middle English variants of embrowd embrown (em-broun'), v. [Formerly also embrown; em-1 + brown. (OF embrunir, darken, make brown or blackish, en- + brun, brown.) I. trans. 1. To make brown; darken.

Whence summer suns embrown a the labouring swains Fenton, To Mr. Southern.

Longfellow, Kavanagh, xviii embruet (em-brü'), v. t. An obsolete spelling of imbrue.

embrute (em-brüt'), v.; pret. and pp. embruted, ppr. embruting. [Formerly also embrute; em-1 + brute.] I. trans. To degrade to the condition of a brute; make brutal or like a brute; brutalize.

All the man embruted in the swine
Cawthorne, Regulation of the Passions.

Mix'd with bestial slime,
This essence to incarnate and embrute,
That to the height of deity aspired!
Milton, P. L., ix 166.

II. intrans. To fall or sink to the condition of a brute.

The soul grows clotted by contagion,
Imbodies, and embrutes, till she quite lose
The divine property of her first being.
Milton, Comus, l. 468.

embryo (em'bri-ü), n. and a. [Formerly also embrio (also embryon, formerly also embryon); F. embryon = Sp. embrion = Pg. embryo = It. embrione, embryon, erroneously taken, appar. at first by French writers, as embryo (n-), as if from a Gr. ἐμβρύον*, but properly embryon (reg. L. embryum*), Gr. ἐμβρυον (stem embry-), the embryo, fetus, also applied to a newly born animal, neut. of ἐμβρύος, growing in, Gr. ἐν, in, + βρύω, swell, be full.] I. n. 1. The fecundated germ of an animal in its earlier stages of development, and before it has assumed the distinctive form and structure of the Early Human Embryo giving diagrammatically the principal vessels antecedent to the establishment of the regular fetal circulation

H, heart; P, lungs; L, liver; 7-8, the aortic trunk or cardiac aorta; c, c, c, common, external and internal carotids; s, subclavian artery; v, vertebral artery; 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, the aorta, as has the persistent left aortic arch hidden; 4, subvertebral aorta; 6, 7, esophageal arteries and veins, to and from 7, the umbilical vessels with its vitelline duct; 8, 9, 10, the two hypogastric or umbilical arteries, with the ramifications, u, u, u, in the placenta; u, umbilical vein; u, hepatic vein; u, inferior vena cava; u, iliac veins; u, an azygos vein; u, a posterior cardinal vein; u, innominate vein; u, renal vein; u, the ductus venosus; u, a ductus arteriosus. The aortic cardinal vein is seen beginning in the head and running down to the ductus arteriosus, on the under side of the numbers 1, 2, 3, 4, 5.

parent; a germ; a rudiment; in a more extended sense, a rudimentary animal during its whole antenatal existence. In the later stages of development, especially in man and the mammals generally, the name fetus commonly takes the place of embryo. In the cases of oviparous animals, the term embryo properly covers the whole course of development of the fecundated germ in the egg (which see, and see utero under dorsal); as, the hen's egg contains an embryo ready to hatch. By a late and loose, though now common, extension of the term, it is applied to various larval stages of some invertebrates, which in the course of their transformation are frequently so different from the parent as to be described as distinct species or genera: as, the embryo (first larval stage) of a centipede worm.

The embryos of a man, dog, seal, bat, reptile, etc., can at first hardly be distinguished from each other.
Darwin, Descent of Man, I 31.

2. In bot., the rudimentary plant contained in the seed, the result of the action of pollen upon the ovule. It may be so rudimentary as to have apparently no distinction of parts, but even in its simplest form it consists virtually of a single but mode of an axis, which upon germination develops into a stem with a leaf or leaves with a terminal bud and a root at the other. In more developed embryos this initial internode or caulicle (often incorrectly called radicle) bears at one end one, two, or more rudimentary leaves called cotyledons, and often an initial bud or plumule. Also called germ. By recent authors the term is also applied to the developed embryo in vascular cryptogams. See cuticle under albumen and cotyledon.

3. The beginning or first state of anything, while yet in a rude and undeveloped condition; the condition of anything which has been conceived but is not yet developed or executed; rudimentary state: chiefly in the phrase in embryo.

There were items of such a Treaty being in Embryo.
Compre, Way of the World, l. 9.

The company little suspected what a noble work I had then in embryo.
Swift.

A little bunch of headless-bishops here,
And there a chance error in embryo.
Shenstone, Schoolmistress.

Epispermic embryo. See epispermic. = Sp. Fetus, Germ, Rudiment. The first of these words is mainly applied to the embryos of viviparous vertebrates in the later stages of their development, when they are more subject to observation. Germ means especially the seed or fecundated ovum, and scarcely extends beyond the early stages of an embryo. Rudiment is simply the specific application of a more general term to a germ or to the early, crude, or 'rudimentary' stages of an embryo.

II. a. Being in the first or rudimentary stage of growth or development; incipient; embryonic: as, an embryo flower.

The embryo manner of the German tribesman, with its village of serfs upon it, might therefore, if the same practice prevailed, differ in three ways from the later manner. Neobohn, Eng. VII. Community, p. 341.

Embryo buds, in bot., the hard nodules which occur in the bark of the beech, olive, and other trees, and are capable of developing leaves and shoots.

emotion (ē-mō'shon), n. [= F. émotion = Sp. emoción = Pg. It. emozione, < L. as if emotio(n-)*, < emotus, pp. of emovere, move out, move away, remove, stir up, agitate: see emove.] 1. Excited or unusual motion; disturbed movement.

I think nothing need to be said to encourage it (bathing in cold water), provided this one caution be used, that he never go into the water, when exercise has at all warmed him or left any emotion in his blood or pulse.

Locke, Education, § 2.

2. An agitated or aroused, and usually distinctly pleasurable or painful, state of mind directed toward some object; technically, a sensation excited by an idea and directed toward an object, and accompanied by some bodily commotion, such as blushing, trembling, weeping, or some slighter disturbance not manifest to a second party. Under violent emotion all the muscles of the body may be affected, but the most common effects are in the expression of the face—the mouth, eyes, and nose, named in the order of their expressiveness. The voice is also generally affected.

The stirrings of pride, vanity, covetousness, indignity, discontent, resentment, these succeed each other through the day in momentary emotions, and are known to fill.

J. H. Newman, Parochial Sermons, l. 44.

It has been usual with psychologists to confound emotions with feeling, because intense feeling is essential to emotion. But, strictly speaking, a state of emotion is a complete state of mind, a psychosis, and not a psychical element, if we may so say. J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 72.

Mellow, melancholy, yet not mournful, the tone seemed to gush up out of the deep well of Hepzibah's heart, all steeped in its profoundest emotion.

Hawthorne, Raven Gables, vi.

-Syn. 1. Trepidation, Tremor, etc. See agitation.
emotional (ē-mō'shon-al), a. [< emotion + -al.] 1. Pertaining to or of the nature of emotion.

Whatever moral benefit can be effected by education must be effected by an education which is emotional rather than perceptive. H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 384.

It is emotional force, not intellectual, that brings out exceptional results. L. F. Ward, Dynam. Sociol., II. 608.

2. Characterized by emotion; attended by or producing emotion; subject to emotion: as, an emotional poem; an emotional temperament.

Great intellect . . . is not readily united with a large emotional nature. A. Bain, Corr. of Forces, p. 236.

2. The practice of working upon the emotions; the disposition to substitute superficial emotion for deeper feeling or right purpose.—3. The expression of emotion.

emotionalist (ē-mō'shon-al-ist), n. [< emotional + -ist.] 1. One who is easily overcome by emotions; a person subject to or controlled by emotion.

The stiff materialist is not educated for a sound investigator any more than the limp emotionalist. N. A. Rev., CXLII. 202.

2. One who endeavors to excite emotional feeling; one who appeals to the emotions rather than to the reason or conscience.

emotionality (ē-mō'shon-al'i-ti), n. [< emotional + -ity.] The quality of being emotional or of expressing emotion; emotionalism.

English which has once been in Italian acquires an emotionality which it does not perhaps wholly lose in returning to itself. The Century, XXX. 206.

The dog . . . does not possess our faculty of imitation, our facial emotionality. Allen, and Neurol. (trans.), VII. 165.

emotioned (ē-mō'shond), a. [< emotion + -ed.] Affected by emotion. [Rare.]

As the young chief th' affecting scene surveys,
How all his form th' emotion'd soul betrays!

Scott, Essay on Painting.

emotive (ē-mō'tiv), a. [< L. emotus, pp. of emovere, move (see emotion), + -ive.] Producing or marked by or manifesting emotion; of an emotional character.

To him display the wonders of their frame,
His own countenance, where eternal art,
Emotive, pants within the alternate heart.

Brooke, Universal Beauty, iv.

Minds of deep emotive sensibility are apt to feel pained, even exasperated, by scientific explanations which decline the imaginary aid of some incomprehensible outlying agency not expressible in terms of experience.

emperor (em-pér'or), n. [Early mod. E. empereur; < MF. empereur, empereur, empereur, < OF. empereur, F. empereur = Pr. empereur = Sp. Pg. emperador = It. imperatore, < L. imperator, imperator, OL. induperator, a military commander-in-chief, ruler, emperor, < imperare, imperare, command: see empire.]

1. A commander-in-chief; a supreme leader of an army or of armies.

To Agamemnon that given the governance hold,
For worthiest of wit that worship to have;
And ordain hym Emperour by oym assent,
With power full playn the peupl to lede.

Deuotion of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 3670.

2. The sovereign or supreme ruler of an empire: a title of dignity conventionally superior to that of king: as, the emperor of Germany or of Russia. See empire. The title emperor, first assumed (with consent of the senate) by Julius Caesar, was held by the succeeding rulers of the Roman, and afterward of the Western and Eastern empires. The line of emperors of the West terminated in A. D. 476, but the title was revived in 800 by Charlemagne who thus laid the foundation of the elective Holy Roman Empire (which was, under empire). The last of his successors had, before his abdication in 1806, adopted the title of hereditary emperor of Austria. The king of Prussia was crowned emperor of Germany in 1871. Peter the Great of Russia assumed the title in 1721, and the ruler of Brazil in 1822: and it was held by Napoleon I. and Napoleon III. of France. In 1876 Queen Victoria of England was proclaimed empress of India. In western speech the sovereigns of Turkey, China, Japan, etc., are called emperors.

Under existing international arrangements the crowned heads of Europe take precedence according to the date of their accession, and their rank is precisely the same, whether their style is imperial or royal. But the proper meaning of emperor is the chief of a confederation of states of which kings are members.

Encyc. Brit., XXXIII. 417.

3. In entom.: (a) In entom.: (1) One of several large sphinxes or moths: as, the peacock emperor, Saturnia pavonia. (2) One of several large butterflies of the family Nymphalidae: as, the purple emperor, the popular name in Great Britain of Apatura iris, also called the purple emphasis (em-fā-sis), n. [= F. emphase (> D. G. emphase = Dan. emfase = Sw. emfas) = Sp. enfasis = Pg. emphasis = It. enfasis, emphasis, < L. emphasis (in pure L. significatio(n): see signification), < (Gr. ἐμφασις, an appearing in, outward appearance, a showing or letting a thing be seen as in a mirror (reflection, image), or as involved, hence, in rhet., pregnant suggestion, indirect indication, significance, emphasis, < ἐμφαίνω, show forth, < ἐν, in, + φαίνω, show, mid. φαίνεσθαι, appear, > φάσις, phase, appearance: see phase.] 1. In rhet.: (a) Originally, a figure consisting in a significant, pregnant, or suggestive mode of expression, implying (especially in connection with the context or the circumstances under which an oration is delivered) more than would necessarily or ordinarily be meant by the words used. This figure is of two kinds, according as it suggests either something more than is said, or something purposely not mentioned or professedly not intended. Poets frequently employ it for the former purpose, especially in similes and epithets. (b) The mode of delivery appropriate to pregnant or suggestive expression; in general, rhetorical stress; in general, significant stress; special stress or force of voice given to the utterance of a word, succession of words, or part of a word, in order to excite special attention. Emphasis on a syllable differs from syllable accent by being exceptional in use, and altering the ordinary pronunciation of the word, either by increasing the stress on the syllable regularly accented or by transferring the accent to another syllable: as, a sin may be a sin of omission or a sin of commission (instead of omission, commission). The province of emphasis is so much more important than that of accent that the customary seat of the latter is transferred in any case where the claims of emphasis require it. K. Porter, Rhetorical Delivery, iv.

2. Special and significant vigor or force: as, emphasis of gestulation; in general, significance; distinctiveness.

External objects stand before us . . . In all the life and emphasis of extension, figure and colour.

Sir W. Hamilton.

—Syn. 1. Emphasis, Accent, Stress. Emphasis is generally upon a word, but may be upon a combination of words or a single syllable. Accent is upon a syllable: as, the place of the accent in the word "demonstrate" is not fixed. Stress is a synonym for either emphasis or accent. See inflection.

That voice all modes of passion can express
Which marks the proper word with proper stress;
But none emphatic can that speaker call
Who lays an equal emphasis on all. Lloyd.

By increasing, therefore, the degree of habitual accent on a given syllable, we can render emphatic the word in which it occurs. G. L. Raymond, Orator's Manual, § 27.

emphasize (em-fā-siz), v. t.; pret. and pp. emphasized, ppr. emphasizing. [emphas (see emphasis) + -ize.] 1. To utter or pronounce with emphasis; render emphatic; lay stress upon: as, to emphasize a syllable, word, or declaration; to emphasize a passage in reading. — 2. To bring out clearly or distinctly; make more obvious or more positive; give a stronger perception of.

In winter [the sea] is warmer, in summer it is cooler, than the ambient air, and the difference is emphasized the farther we get away from the shore.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVI, 535.

Unequal powers have made unequal opportunities first, however much the unequal opportunities afterwards may react on and emphasize the situation.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S. XLII, 102.

emphatic (em-fat'ik), a. [= F. emphatique = Sp. enfático = Pg. enfático = It. enfatico (cf. G. emphatisch = *Dan. He was emphatically a popular writer. Macaulay.

The doctrine that religion could be destined to pass through successive phases of development was pronounced to be emphatically unchristian. Lecky, Rationalism, I, 100.

4. According to appearance; according to impression produced.

What is delivered of their [dolphins'] incurvity must be taken emphatically: that is, not really, but in appearance. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., v. 2.

emphaticalness (em-fat'ik-al-nes), n. The quality of being emphatic. [Rare.]

emphysis (em-fis-sis), n.; pl. emphyses (-sēz). [NL., < (Gr. ἐν, in, on, + φύσις, an eruption, < φύω, break out, boil over.) In med., a vesicular tumor or eruption.

emphotion (em-fō-ti-on), n.; pl. emphotia (-tē). [Gr. ἐμφώτιον (also ἐμφώτιον emphōtikon), lit. a garment of light, < ἐν, in, + φῶς (phōs), light.] In the Gr. Ch., the white robe put on immediately after baptism; the chrism.

emphractic (em-frak'tik), a. and n. [Gr. ἐμφρακτικός, likely to obstruct, < ἐμφράσσω, obstruct, block up, < ἐν, in, + φράσσω, fence in, block, stop.] 1. a. In med., having the property of closing the pores of the skin.

II. n. A substance which when applied to the skin has the property of closing the pores.

emphrenay (em-fren'zi), v. t. [em-fren + phrensy, obs. form of frenzy.] To make frenzied; madden.

Is it a ravenous beast, a covetous oppressor? his tooth like a mad dog's envenoms and emphrenays.

Sp. Hall, St. Paul's Combat.

emphyema (em-fī-mē), n. [NL., < (Gr. ἐν, in, + φύμα, a tumor, a growth, < φύω, grow.) A tumor.

emphysem (em-fī-sem), n. The English form of emphysema. [Rare.]

emphysema (em-fī-sē-mā), n. [NL., < (Gr. ἐμφύσημα, an inflation (of the stomach, peritoneum, etc.), < ἐμφύω, blow in, inflate, < ἐν, in, + φύω, blow in.) In pathol., distention with air or other gases. — Interstitial emphysema, the presence of air or other gases in the interstices of the tissues. — Vesicular emphysema, the permanent dilatation of the alveolar passages and infundibula of the lungs, the air-cells becoming obliterated. Also called alveolar ectasia.

emphysematous, emphysematose (em-fī-sēm-a-tūs, -tōs), a. [emphysema (see emphysema) + -ous, -ose.] 1. Pertaining to, characterized by, or of the nature of emphysema; distended; bloated. — 2. In bot., bladderly; resembling a bladder.

emphyteusis (em-fī-tū-sis), n. [LL. (in Roman civil law), < (Gr. ἐμψυτεύσις (only in Roman use), lit. an implanting, < ἐμψύω, implant, ingraft, < ἐμψύω, implanted, ingrafted, inborn, innate (> ult. E. imp, q. v.), < ἐμψύω, implant, pass. grow in, < ἐν, in, + ψύω, produce, pass. grow.) In Rom. law, a contract by which houses or lands were given forever or for a long term on condition of their being improved and a stipulated annual rent paid to the grantor. It was usually for a perpetual term, thus corresponding to the feudal fee.

We are told that with the municipalities began the practice of letting out agri vestigales, that is, of leasing land for a perpetuity to a free tenant, at a fixed rent, and under certain conditions. The plan was afterwards extensively imitated by individual proprietors, and the tenant, whose relation to the owner had originally been determined by his contract, was subsequently recognised by the Praetor as having himself a qualified proprietorship, which in time became known as Emphyteusis.

Maine, Ancient Law, p. 299.

emphyteuta (em-fī-tū-tā), n. [LL., < (Gr. ἐμψυτεύτης, a tenant by emphyteusis: see emphyteusis).] In Rom. law, a tenant by emphyteusis.

emphyteutic (em-fī-tū-tik), a. [LL. emphyteuticus, < emphyteuta, q. v.] Pertaining to emphyteusis; held on the form of tenure known as emphyteusis; taken on hire, for which rent is to be paid: as, emphyteutic lands.

We have distinct proof that what is called in Roman law emphyteutic tenure was in use among the Greeks in the case of sacred land. C. T. Newton, Art and Archaeol., p. 145.

Emphyteutic lease. Same as baill à longues années (which see, under baill).

emphyteuticaries (em-fī-tū-ti-kā-ri), n.; pl. emphyteuticaries (-riz). [LL. emphyteuticarius, < emphyteusis: see emphyteutic.] In Rom. law, one who held lands by emphyteusis; an emphyteuta.

Emphytus (em-fī-tus), n. [NL., < (Gr. ἐμψυτός, ingrafted, inserted: see emphyteusis, and emphyteuta).] A genus of hymenopterous insects, of the family Tenthredinidae, founded by Klug in 1881, having short wings with 2 marginal and 3 submarginal cells, filiform 9-jointed antennae.

Strawberry False-worm (Emphytus maculatus).

1, 2, pupa, ventral and lateral views (line shows natural size); 3, fly, enlarged (wings on one side detached); 4, larva; 5, fly with wings closed; 6, larva curled up; 7, cocoon; 8, antenna; 9, egg. (4, 5, 6, and 7 natural size; 8 and 9 enlarged.)

transverse head, prominent eyes, and a long abdomen, cylindrical in the male, and broad and carinate in the female. The larvae have 22 legs, and are leaf-feeders. The male of E. maculatus is black, the female honey-yellow; its larva feeds on the strawberry, and is known in the United States and Canada as the strawberry false-worm.

Empidæ (em-pi-dē), n. pl. [NL., contr. of Empidæ, < Empis (Empid-), the typical genus: see Empis.] A family of tetrachateous brachycerous flies, of the order Diptera, containing upward of 1,000 species, mostly of small size, inhabiting temperate and cold countries. They are characterized by a globose head with contiguous eyes, a simple third antenna-joint, and lengthened tarsal cells of the wings. They are very active and voracious, and in general resemble the Asilidæ. Species of this family may be seen dancing in swarms over running water in spring-time. The slender larvae live in garden-mold. Also Empididæ and Empidæ.

Empididæ (em-pi-dī-dē), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Empidæ.

Empidonax (em-pi-dō-naks), n. [NL. (Cabanis, 1855), < (Gr. ἐμπίς (em-pis), a mosquito, gnât (see Empis), + ἀναξ, king.) A large genus of small American olivaceous flycatchers, of the family Tyrannidae, inhabiting North, Central, and South America, having the bill and feet moderate in length among allied genera, of mean length among related flycatchers, the wings pointed, the tail emarginate, and the Traill's Flycatcher (Empidonax traillii).

plumage mostly dull-greenish. Four species are very common woodland migratory insectivorous birds of the eastern United States: the Acadian flycatcher, E. acadicus; Traill's, E. traillii; the least, E. minimus; and the yellow-bellied, E. flaviventris.

empiercet (em-pērs'), v. t. [em-i + pierce.] See empierce.

He stroke so hugely with his borrowd blade,

That it empiercet the Pagana burghes.

Spenser, F. Q., II, viii, 43.

empight (em-pit'), a. [em-i + pight.] Fixed.

Three bodies in one wast empight.

Spenser, F. Q., V, i, 2.

empire (em'pir), n. [ME. empyre, empyre, empyre (also emperie, empyre: see empyry), < (OF. empyre (also emperie), F. empire = Pr. emperi, emperi = Sp. Eg. It. imperio, < L. imperium, imperium, command, control, domination, sovereignty, a dominion, empire, < imperare, imperare, command, order, < im, in, on, + parare, make ready, order: see para. Cf. imperial, etc.)] 1. Supreme power in governing; imperial power; dominion; sovereignty.

Your Majesty (my most gracious Sovereign) have showed your self to all the world, for this one and thirty years, as our glorious monarch, above all other Princes of Christendom, not only fortunate, but also most sufficient virtuous and worthy of Empire.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poetrie, p. 37.

He here stalks
Upon the heads of Romans, and their princes, Familiarly to empire.

R. Jonson, Sejanus, iv. 3.

Westward the course of empire takes its way.

Bp. Berkeley, Arts and Learning in America.

If we do our duties as honestly and as much in the fear of God as our forefathers did, we need not trouble ourselves much about other titles to empire.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 244.

2. The country, region, or union of states or territories under the jurisdiction and dominion of an emperor or other powerful sovereign or government; usually, a territory of greater extent than a kingdom, which may be, and often is, of small extent: as, the Roman or the Russian empire. The designation empire has been assumed in modern times by some small or homogeneous monarchies, generally ephemeral; but properly an empire is an aggregate of conquered, colonized, or confederated states, each with its own government subordinate or tributary to that of the empire as a whole. Such were and are all the great historical empires; and in this sense the name is applied appropriately to any large aggregation of separate territories under one monarch, whatever his title may be: as, the Assyrian, Babylonian, and Persian empires; the empire of Alexander the Great; the British empire, etc. See emperor, and Holy Roman Empire, below.

3. Supreme control; governing influence; rule; sway: as, the empire of reason or of truth.

We disdain
To do those servile offices, oft times
His foolish pride and empire will exact.

B. Jonson, Magnetick Lady, iii. 4.

The sword turns preacher, and dictates propositions by empire instead of arguments.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 380.

It is to the very end of our days a struggle between our reason and our temper, which shall have the empire over us.

Steele, Tatler, No. 172.

Circle of the empire. See circle.—Eastern Empire, or Empire of the East, originally, that division of the Roman empire which had its seat in Constantinople. Its final separation from the Western Empire dates from the death of Theodosius the Great (A. D. 395), whose sons Arcadius and Honorius received respectively the eastern and western divisions of the Roman dominion. After the fall of the Western Empire, the Empire of the East is commonly known as the Byzantine empire. It continued until the capture of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453.—Empire City, the city of New York: so called as being the chief city of the Empire State, and the commercial metropolis of the United States.—Empire State, the State of New York: so called from its superior population and wealth as compared with the other States of the Union.—Holy Roman Empire, the German-Roman empire in western and central Europe (in later times commonly styled the German empire), which, after a lapse of more than three hundred years, reunited a large portion of the territories formerly belonging to the Western Empire. The union of the German royal and Roman imperial crowns began with Charles the Great or Charlemagne, king of the Franks, who was crowned emperor by the Pope at Rome A. D. 800; but the line of German kings who were at the same time Holy Roman emperors begins properly with Otto the Great, crowned emperor in 962. The empire was regarded as the temporal form of a theoretically universal dominion, whose spiritual head was the Pope, and the earlier emperors were crowned at Rome by the spiritual rulers of Christendom. The empire continued under monarchs of the Saxon, Franconian, and Hohenstaufen dynasties, passing in 1273 to the Austrian house of Hapsburg, the members of which line remained in uninterrupted possession of the empire from 1273 until its final extinction in 1806. It had long previously lost the greater part of the external territories which had entitled it to be called Roman; and its final dissolution was due to the conquests and encroachments of Napoleon I. (See emperor.) The emperors were elected by certain of the more powerful German princes called electors, whose number was definitely fixed at seven by the Golden Bull of 1356, and remained at that number with but slight changes.—The Celestial Empire. See celestial.—Western Empire, the distinctive designation of the western portion of the Roman world after its division into two independent empires in A. D. 395. (See Eastern Empire, above.) Its power very rapidly declined under the invasions of barbarians and other adverse influences, and it was finally extinguished in A. D. 476.—Syn. 1. Sway, dominion, rule, reign, government, supremacy.

empirema (em-pi-rē-mā), n.; pl. empiremata (-mā-tā). [NL., < Gr. as if ἐμπειρία*, < ἐμπειρίαι, experienced in, < ἐμπειρία, experienced: see empiric.] In logic, a proposition grounded upon experience. Also spelled empirema.

empireship (em-pi-rē-ship), n. The power, sovereignty, or dominion of an empire.

England has seized the empireship of India.
Library Mag., July, 1888.

empiric (em-pi-rē-ik), a. and n. [Formerly empirick; < OF. empirique, F. empirique = Sp. empirico = Pg. it. empirico (cf. D. G. empirisch = Dan. Sw. empirisk), < L. empiricus, < Gr. ἐμπειρικός, experienced (cf. ἐμπειρία, the Empiric: see II., 1), < ἐμπειρία, experience, mere experience or practice without knowledge, esp. in medicine, empiricism, < ἐμπειρία, experienced or practiced in, < ἐν, in, + πειρα, a trial, experiment, attempt; akin to πειρα, a way, < πείρω, πειράω* = E. fore, go.] I. a. 1. Same as empiricist.—2. Versed in physical experimentation: as, an empiric alchemist.—3. Of or pertaining to the medical empirics.

It is accounted an error to commit a natural body to empiric physicians. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, I. 17.

II. a. 1. [cap.] One of an ancient sect of Greek physicians who maintained that practice or experience, and not theory, is the foundation of the science of medicine.

Among the Greek physicians, those who founded their practice on experience called themselves empirici, those who relied on theory, methodists, and those who held a middle course, dogmatists.

Fleming, Vocab. of Philos. (ed. Krauth), p. 157.

2. An experimenter in medical practice, destitute of adequate knowledge; an irregular or unscientific physician; more distinctively, a quack or charlatan.

It is not safe for the Church of Christ when bishops learn what belongeth unto government, as empirics learn physic, by killing of the sick. Hooker, Eccl. Polity, vii. 24.

This is the cause why empirics and old women are more happy many times in their cures than learned physicians, because they are more religious in holding their medicines. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 108.

There are many empirics in the world who pretend to infallible methods of curing all patients.

Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. viii.

Empiricks and mountebanks.

Shafesbury, Advice to an Author, II. § 2.

3. In general, one who depends mainly upon experience or intuition; one whose procedure in any field of action or inquiry is too exclusively empirical.

The empiric, . . . instead of ascending from sense to intellect (the natural progress of all true learning), . . . hurries, on the contrary, into the midst of sense, where he wanders at random without any end, and is lost in a labyrinth of infinite particulars. Harris, Hermes, iv.

Vague generalizations may form the stock in trade of the political empiric, but he is an empiric notwithstanding. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 61.

—Syn. 2. Mountebank, etc. See quack, n.

empirical (em-pi-rē-ik), a. [empiric + -al.]

1. Pertaining to or derived from experience or experiments; depending upon or derived from the observation of phenomena.

In philosophical language the term empirical means simply what belongs to or is the product of experience or observation. See W. Hamilton.

Now here again we may observe the error into which Locke was led by confounding the cause of our ideas with their occasion. There can be no idea, he argues, prior to experience; granted. Therefore he concludes the mind previous to it is, as it were, a tabula rasa, owing every notion which it gains primarily to an empirical source. J. D. Morrell.

The empirical generalization that guides the farmer in his rotation of crops serves to bring his actions into concord with certain of the actions going on in plants and soil. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 28.

2. Derived, as a general proposition, from a narrow range of observation, without any warrant for its exactitude or for its wider validity.

The empirical diagram only represents the relative number and position of the parts, just as a careful observation shows them in the flower, but if the diagram also indicates the places where members are suppressed, . . . I call it a theoretical diagram. Sachs, Botany (trans.), p. 526.

It is not at all impossible that Henry II. may have been among the pupils of Vacarius: certainly he was more of a lawyer than mere empirical education could make him. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 303.

3. Pertaining to the medical practice of an empiric, in either of the medical senses of that word; hence, charlatanical; quackish.

The empirical treatment he submitted to . . . hastened his end. Goldsmith, Bellingbrooke.

Empirical certainty, cognition, ego, idealism, etc. See the nouns.—Empirical formula or law, a formula which sufficiently satisfies certain observations, but which is not supported by any established theory or probable hypothesis, so that it cannot be relied upon far beyond the conditions of the observations upon which it rests. Thus, the formula of Dalton and Petit expressing the relation between the temperature of a body and its radiative power cannot be extended to the calculation of the heat of the sun, since there is no reason for supposing that it would approximate to the truth so far beyond the temperatures at which the experiments were made.

empirically (em-pi-rē-ik-ly), adv. In an empirical manner; by experiment; according to experience; without science; in the manner of quacks.

Every science begins by accumulating observations, and presently generalizes them empirically.

H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 22.

empiricism (em-pi-rē-iz-izm), n. [empiric + -ism. See empiric.] 1. The character of being empirical; reliance on direct experience and observation rather than on theory; empirical method; especially, an undue reliance upon mere individual experience.

He [Radcliffe] knew, it is true, that experience, the safest guide after the mind is prepared for her instructions by previous institution, is apt, without such preparation, to degenerate to a vulgar and presumptuous empiricism. F. Knox, Essays, xxviii.

At present, he [Bacon] reflected, some were content to rest in empiricism and isolated facts; others ascended too hastily to first principles. E. A. Abbott, Bacon, p. 344.

What is called empiricism is the application of superficial truths, recognized in a loose, unsystematic way, to immediate and special needs.

L. F. Ward, Dynam. Sociol., II. 203.

2. In med., the practice of empirics; hence, quackery; the pretension of an ignorant person to medical skill.

Shudder to destroy life, either by the naked knife or by the surer and safer medium of empiricism. Wright.

3. The metaphysical theory that all ideas are derived from sensuous experience—that is, that there are no innate or a priori conceptions.

The terms Empiricism, Empiricist, Empirical, although commonly employed by metaphysicians with contempt to mark a mode of investigation which admits no higher source than experience (by them often unwarrantably restricted to sensation), may be accepted without demur, since even the flavor of contempt only serves to emphasize the distinction.

G. H. Lewes, Proba. of Life and Mind, I. II. 4 14.

empiricist (em-pi-rē-ist), n. [empiric + -ist.]

1. One who believes in philosophical empiricism; one who regards sensuous experience as the sole source of all ideas and knowledge.

Berkeley, as a consistent empiricist, saw that sensation shuts itself up within its own house, and does not include its object. The object must be supplied from without, and he supplied it provisionally by the name of God. N. A. Rice, Ch. K., 408.

The empiricist can take no cognizance of anything that transcends experience. New Princeton Rev., II. 103.

2. A medical empiric.

empiricist, empiricist (em-pi-rē-ist), a. [empiric + -ist.] An unmeaning extension of empiric. Empirical.

The most sovereign prescription in Galen is but empiric. Shak., Cor., II. 1.

empirism (em-pi-riz-izm), n. [= F. empirisme = Sp. Pg. It. empirismo = D. Dan. empirismo = Sw. empirism, < NL. empirismus, < Gr. ἐμπειρία, experienced: see empiric.] Empiricism. [Rare.]

It is to this sense [second muscular], mainly, that we owe the conception of force, the origin of which empirism could never otherwise explain.

G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 219.

empiristic (em-pi-ris-ik), a. Of or pertaining to empiricism or to the empiricists; empirical. [Rare.]

The empiristic view which Helmholtz defends is that the space-determinations we perceive are in every case products of a process of unconscious inference. W. James, Mind, XII. 548.

Emplis (em-pis), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1767), < Gr. ἐμπίς (em-pis), a mosquito, gnât, larva of the gadfly; cf. Apia.] The typical genus of the family Empidæ.

emplace (em-plās'), v. t.; pret. and pp. emplaced, ppr. emplacing. [OF. emplacier, place, emplace, < en + placer, place: see place.] To place; locate. [Rare.]

They [Frank buildings] were emplaced on terraces formed of vast blocks of hewn stone, and were approached by staircases of striking and unusual design.

G. Rawlinson, Origin of Nations, I. 101.

emplacement (em-plās-ment), n. [OF. emplacement, < OF. emplacier, place: see emplace.] 1. A placing or fixing in place; location. [Rare.]

But till recently it was impossible to give to us any more definite emplacement.

G. Rawlinson, Origin of Nations, II. 241.

2. Place or site. Specifically, in fort.: (a) The space within a fortification allotted for the position and service of a gun or battery.

The emplacements should be connected with each other and with the barracks by screened roads. Nature, XXXVI. 86.

(b) The platform or bed prepared for a gun and its carriage.

emplaster (em-plās-ter), n. [ME. emplastre, < OF. emplastre, F. emplâtre = Pr. emplastro = Sp. emplasto = Pg. emplastro = It. emplastro, implastro, < L. emplastrum, a plaster, also, in horticulture, the band of bark which surrounds the eye in grafting, the scutcheon, < Gr. ἐμπλάστρον (also ἐμπλάστρεα) and ἐμπλάστρον, with or without φάρμακον, a plaster or salve, neut. of ἐμπλάσσειν, daubed on or over, < ἐμπλάσσειν, plaster up, stuff in, < ἐν, in, + πλάσσειν, form, mold. Abbr. plaster, q. v.] A plaster.

The spirits are sedately moved both from vapours and passions, . . . and the parts by baths, unguents, or emplasters.

Bacon, On Learning, iv. 2.

All emplasters applied to the breasts ought to have a hole for the nipples.

Wienman, Surgery.

emplaster (em-plas'tér), v. t. [*< ME. emplastrer, < OF. emplastrer, F. emplâtrer = Pr. emplastrar = Sp. emplastrar = Pg. emplastar = It. emplastare, implastare, < L. emplastrare, graft, bud, M.L. plaster. Cf. Gr. ἐμπλάσσειν, put on a plaster, < ἐμπλάσσειν, a plaster: see emplaster, n. Abbr. plaster, q. v.] 1. To cover with or as with a plaster; gloss over; palliate.*

Parde, als fair na ye his name emplastre.
He (Solomon) was a leech and an ydolastre.
Chaucer, Merchant's Tale, l. 1653.

2. To graft or bud.

The tree that shall emplastred be the chy.
Take of the gemme and bark, and thro to bynde
This gemme unhurt.
Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 161.

emplastic (em-plas'tik), a. and n. [*< Gr. ἐμπλαστικός, stopping the pores, clogging, < ἐμπλάσσειν, plaster up, stop up, stuff in, etc.: see emplaster, n.] I. a. Viscous; glutinous; adhesive; fit to be applied as a plaster: as, *emplastic applications.

II. n. A constipating medicine.

emplastration, n. The act of budding or grafting.

Solempnyte hath emplastracion.
What of before is taught the diligence.
Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 163.

empleadit, v. t. See implead.

emplectite (em-plek'tit), n. [< Gr. ἐμπλεκτικός, inwoven (see empletum), < -ίτις.] A sulphid of bismuth and copper, occurring in prismatic crystals of a grayish or tin-white color and bright metallic luster.

emplectum, empletion (em-plek'tum, -ton), n. [< Gr. ἐμπλεκτός, rubble-work, neut. of ἐμπλέκω, inwoven, < ἐμπλέκω, inwoven, entwined, entangle, < ἐν, in, + πλέκω, weave.] In arch., either of two kinds of masonry in use among the Greeks and Romans, and other peoples. (a) That kind of solid masonry in regular courses in which the courses are formed alternately entirely of blocks presenting one of their sides to the exterior and entirely of blocks presenting their ends to the exterior.

Sometimes the (Etruscan) wall is built in alternate courses, in the style which has been called emplecton, the ends of the stones being exposed in one course, and the sides in the other. A. R. Robinson, Orig. of Nations, l. 114.

(b) That kind of masonry, much used in ancient fortification-walls, etc., in which the outside surfaces on both sides are formed of ashlar laid in regular courses, and the inclosed space between them is filled in with rubble work, cross-stones being usually placed at intervals, either in courses or as ties extending from face to face of the wall, and binding the whole together. The term is, however, a loose one, and can be applied to any sort of masonry of greater thickness than the width of a single block, and so laid that the wall is bound together by a regular alternation of blocks placed lengthwise and endwise. Sometimes erroneously written empletion.

emplete, v. t. See implead.

emplet, v. t. A Middle English variant of impley.

emploret (em-plor'), v. t. An obsolete form of implore.

employ (em-ploi'), v. t. [Formerly also imply; *< OF. employer, employer (early emplier: see imply, imply), F. employer = Pr. employer = Sp. emplear = Pg. employer = It. impiegare, < L. implicare, unfold, involve, engage, < in, in, + plicare, fold: see plicate, and cf. implicate and imply.] 1. To inclose; infold.—2. To give occupation to; make use of the time, attention, or labor of; keep busy or at work; use as an agent.

Nothing advances a business more than when he that is employed is believed to know the mind and to have the heart, of him that sends him. Donne, Sermons, v.

Tell him I have some business to employ him.
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, l. 1

The mellow harp did not their ears employ,
And mute was all the warlike symphony.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., xli. 218.

This is a day in which the thoughts of our countrymen ought to be employed on serious subjects.
Addison, Frodoholder.

3. To make use of as an instrument or means; apply to any purpose: as, to employ medicines in curing diseases.

All d, half to be employed to the use of the said City, and the other half to the sustentation of the said fraternite.
English Guilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 336.

Prose ought not to be abused and employed upon any unworthy matter & subject.
Pattinson, Arte of Eng. Poetrie, p. 18.

Thou shalt not destroy the trees, . . . and thou shalt not cut them down . . . to employ them in the siege.
Deut. xx. 19.

You must use
The best of your discretion to employ
This gift as I intend it.

Ford, Broken Heart, III. 5.

4. To occupy; use; apply or devote to an object; pass in occupation: as, to employ an hour, a day, or a week; to employ one's life.

Some men employ their health, an ugly trick,
In making known how oft they have been sick,
And give us in recitals of disease
A doctor's trouble, but without the fees.
Cooper, Conversation, l. 311.

The friends of liberty wasted . . . the time which ought to have been employed in preparing for vigorous national defense.
Macaulay, Sir J. Mackintosh.

Syn. 2. Employ, Hire. Hire and employ are words of different meaning. To hire is to engage in service for wages. The word does not imply dignity; it is not customary to speak of hiring a teacher or a pastor; we hire a man for wages; we employ him for wages or a salary. To employ is thus a word of wider signification. A man hired to labor is employed, but a man may be employed in a work who is not hired, yet the presumption is that the one employing pays. Employ expresses continuous occupation more often than hire does.

employ (em-ploi'), n. [< F. employer = Sp. empleo = Pg. emprego = It. impiego; from the verb.] Occupation; employment.

As to the genius of the people, they are industrious, . . . but luxurious and extravagant on the days when they have repose from the employments.
Pococke, Description of the East, II. II. 10.

With due respect and joy,
I trace the matron at her loved employ.
Crabbe, Works, l. 58.

It happens that your true dull minds are generally preferred for public employ, and especially promoted to city honors; your keen intellects, like razors, being considered too sharp for common service.
Irving, Kulechbocker, p. 161.

employable (em-ploi'ə-bəl), a. [< employ + -able.] That may be employed; capable of being used; fit or proper for use.

employedness (em-ploi'ed-nəs), n. The state of being employed.

Things yet less consistent with chemistry and employedness than with freedom, or with truth.
Boyle, Works, VI. 38.

employee (em-ploi-ē'), n. [< employ + -ee, after F. employé, fem. employée, one employed, pp. of employer, employ.] One who works for an employer; a person working for salary or wages; applied to any one so working, but usually only to clerks, workmen, laborers, etc., and but rarely to the higher officers of a corporation or government, or to domestic servants: as, the employees of a railroad company. [Often written employé or employee even as an English word.]

To keep the capital thus invested (in materials for railway construction), and also a large staff of employees, standing idle entails loss, partly negative, partly positive.
H. Spencer, Railway Morals.

employer (em-ploi-ēr), n. [= F. employer.] One who employs; a user; a person engaging or keeping others in service.

By a short contract you are sure of making it the interest of the contractor to exert that skill for the satisfaction of his employers.
Burke, Constitutional Reform.

Employers and Workmen Act, an English statute of 1875 (38 and 39 Vict., c. 10), which enlarges the powers of county courts in disputes between masters and employees, and gives other courts certain civil jurisdiction in such cases.

Empurpled with celestial roses smiled.
Milton, P. L., III. 364.

Their roscate morn
Pour all her splendours on the empurpled scene
T. Warton, Pleasures of Melancholy

We saw the grass, green from November till April snowed with daisies, and the floors of the dusky little dingles empurpled with violets.
The Century, XXX. 219

Empusa (em-pū-'sū), n. [NL. (Illiger, 1798), < Gr. ἐμψυσα, a hobgoblin.] 1. A genus of gnat-like orthopteran insects, of the family Mantidae, having foliaceous appendages on the head and legs, short antennae, and a very slim thorax. E. pauperata is a prettily colored European species of rear-horse or praying-mantis. — 2. A genus of lepidopterous insects. Hübner, 1816. — 3. In bot., the principal genus of Entomophthoraceae, including, as now understood, the species formerly referred to the genus Entomophthora. The species are parasitic upon insects. That upon the common house fly is the one most frequently observed, forming a white halo of spores around dead flies adhering to window panes in autumn. Spores of an Empusa, coming in contact with a suitable insect, enter it by means of hyphal germination and grow rapidly till the insect is killed, forming sometimes a necrotum, but commonly by budding, detached hyphal bodies of spherical or oval form. When the conditions are unfavorable to further growth the hyphal bodies may be transformed into chlamydospores, but under favorable conditions of moisture the hyphal bodies or chlamydospores produce hyphae. At the tip of each is formed a single conidium in a sporangium similar to that of Mucor; or, instead of conidia, thick-walled and spherical resting spores may be formed, either asexually or by conjugation. Twenty-six species are now known in the United States, growing upon insects of all the hexapod orders.

empuset (em-pūs-'t), n. [ML. empusa, < Gr. ἐμψυσα, a hobgoblin assuming various shapes: sometimes identified with Hecate.] A goblin or specter. Jer. Taylor.

Empusidae (em-pū-'sī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Empusa, 1, + -idae.] A family of Orthoptera, taking name from the genus Empusa. Hurmeister, 1838.

In th' empyreal heaven, the blessed abide,
The Thrones and the boundless prostrate lie,
Not daring to behold their angry God
Dryden, Annus Mirabilis, l. 1114.

Yet upward she [the goddess] incessant flies;
Resolv'd to reach the high empyrean sphere;
Prior, Carmen Seculare (1700), st. 23

Displays empyrean will I sometimes teach Thine honeyed tongue.
Keats, Endymion, II.

II. n. The region of pure light and fire; the highest heaven, where the pure element of fire was supposed by the ancients to exist: the same as the ether, the ninth heaven according to ancient astronomy.

The deep-domed empyrean
Rings to the roar of an angel's shout.
Tennyson, Experiments in Quantity.

empyreum (em-pi-rō-'ūm), n. [ML. empyreum: see empyrean.] Same as empyrean.

Passed through all
The winding orbs like an Intelligence,
Up to the empyreum
B. Jonson, Fortunate Isles.

empyreuma (em-pi-rō-'mā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐμπύρευμα, a live coal covered with ashes to preserve the fire, < ἐμπύρεος, set on fire, kindle, < ἐμπίρην, on fire: see empyrean.] In chem., the pungent disagreeable taste and odor of most animal or vegetable substances when burned in close vessels, or when subjected to destructive distillation.

empyreumatic, empyreumatical (em-pi-rō-'mā-'tīk, -ī-kāl), a. [Empyreuma + -ic, -ical.] Pertaining to or having the taste or smell of slightly burned animal or vegetable substances. — Empyreumatic oil, an oil obtained from organic substances when decomposed by a strong heat.

empyreumatize (em-pi-rō-'mā-'tīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. empyreumatized, ppr. empyreumatizing. [Empyreuma + -ize.] To render empyreumatic; decompose by heat. [Rare.]

empyreal (em-pir-'ī-kāl), a. [Gr. ἐμπύρεος, in fire, on fire: see empyrean.] Of or pertaining to combustion or combustibility. [Rare.]

Of these and some other empyreal marks I shall say no more, as they do not tell us the defects of the soils.
Kirwan, Manures, p. 81.

empyrosist (em-pi-rō-'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐμπύρωσις, a kindling, heating, < ἐμπίρην, equiv. to ἐμπύρεος, kindle: see empyreuma.] A general fire; a conflagration.

The former opinion, that held these cataclysms and empyroses universal, was such as held that it put a total consummation unto things in this lower world, especially that of conflagration.
Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

empyryt, n. [ME. empyry, < OF. empyrée, F. empyrée: see empyrean.] The empyrean.

ed by having no casque or helmet on the head, which, with the neck, is more completely feathered. The plumage is sooty brown or blackish, and very copious, like long curly hair, there being two plumes to the quill, so that each feather seems double. The wings are rudimentary, useless for flight, and concealed in the plumage. The emus are intermediate in size between the cassowaries and the ostriches. The species first named above is the one most commonly seen in confinement.

2. (a) [cap.] [NL., orig. in the form Emou.] A genus of cassowaries. Barrère, 1745. (b) The specific name of the galeated cassowary of Ceram, in the form emou. Latham, 1790. (c) The specific name of the east Australian Dromas nova-hollandie, in the form emu. Stephens.

emu (ē-'mū), n. An Australian wood used for turners' work. Laslett.

emulable (em-'ū-lā-bil), a. [Emul(ate) + -able.] That may be emulated; capable of attainment by emulous effort; worthy of emulation. [Rare.]

This I say to all, for none are so complete but they may spy some imitable and emulable good, even in meaner Christians
Abp. Leighton, On 1 Pet. III. 13.

emulate (em-'ū-lāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. emulated, ppr. emulating. [L. emulatus, pp. of emulari (> F. emule, v.), try to equal or excel, be emulous, < emulus (> F. emule, n.), trying to equal or excel: see emulous.] 1. To strive to equal or excel in qualities or actions; vie or compete with the character, condition, or performance of; rival imitatively or competitively: as, to emulate good or bad examples; to emulate one's friend or an ancient author.

I would have Him emulate you: 'tis no shame to follow
The better precedent.
B. Jonson, Catiline.

The birds sing louder, sweeter,
And every note they emulate one another.
Fletcher, Pilgrim, v. 4.

He [Dryden] is always imitating — no, that is not the word, always emulating — somebody in his more strictly poetical attempts, for in that direction he always needed some external impulse to set his mind in motion.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 41.

2. To be a match or counterpart for; imitate; resemble.

Thine eye would emulate the diamond.
Shak., M. W. of W., III. 2.

It is likewise attended with a delirium, fury, and an involuntary laughter, the convulsion emulating this motion.
Arbutnot.

The blossom opening to the day,
The dew of heav'n's refin'd,
Could naught of purity display,
To emulate his mind.
Goldsmith, Vesp. Hymn

3. To envy.

The council then present, emulating my success, would not think it fit to spare me for the men to be hazarded in those unknown regions.

Capt. John Smith, True Travels, I. 125.

emulate (em'ū-lāt), v. [L. emulatus, pp.: see the verb.] Emulative; eager to equal or excel.

Our last king . . .
Was, as you know, by Fortinbras of Norway,
There to prick'd on by a most emulative pride, Dart'd to the combat. Shak., Hamlet, I. 1.

emulation (em'ū-lā'shon), n. [= F. emulation = Pr. emulatio = Sp. emulacion = Pg. emulação = It. emulazione, < L. emulatio (n.), < emulari, emulate: see emulate.] 1. Love of superiority; desire or ambition to equal or excel others; the instinct that incites to effort for the attainment of equal or superior excellence or estimation in any respect.

Among the lower animals we see many symptoms of emulation, but in them its effects are perfectly insignificant when compared with those which it produces in human conduct. . . . In our own race emulation operates in an infinite variety of directions, and is one of the principal sources of human improvement.

D. Stewart, Moral Powers, I. II. § 5.

Let the man who thinks he is actuated by generous emulation only, and wishes to know whether there be anything of envy in the case, examine his own heart.

Beattie, Moral Science, I. II. § 3.

2. Effort to equal or excel in qualities or actions; imitative rivalry, as of that which one admires in another or others: as, the emulation of great actions, or of the rich by the poor.

Then younger brothers may eate grass, y^e they cannot achieve to excell; which will bring a blessed emulation to England. Book of Precedence (F. E. T. S. extra set.), I. 11.

The apostle exhorts the Corinthians to an holy and general emulation of the charity of the Macedonians, in contributing freely to the relief of the poor saints at Jerusalem.

South, Sermons.

But now, since the rewards of honour are taken away, that virtuous emulation is turned into direct malice.

Dryden, Essay on Dram. Poetry.

3. Antagonistic rivalry; malicious or injurious contention; strife for superiority. [Unusual.]

What madness rules in brain sick men,
When, for so slight and frivolous a cause,
Such factious emulations shall arise.

Shak., I. Hen. VI., iv. 1.

My heart laments that virtue cannot live
Out of the teeth of emulation. Shak., J. C., II. 3.

=Syn. 1 and 2. Emulation, Competition, Rivalry. The natural love of superiority is known as emulation, in common use the word signifies the desire and the resulting endeavor to equal or surpass another or others in some quality, attainment, or achievement. It is intrinsically neutral both as to time and motive, but it is most frequently applied to the relations of contemporaries or associates, and to feelings and efforts of an honorable nature. Competition is the act of striving against others; the word is used only where the object to be attained is pretty clearly in mind, and that object is not mere superiority, but some definite thing: as, competition for a prize; competition in business. Rivalry, unless qualified by some favorable adjective, is generally a contest in which the competitors push their several interests in an ungenerous spirit, malignant feelings being easily a result. Rivalry may be general in its character: as, the rivalry between two states or cities, in such cases it may be friendly and honorable.

A noble emulation heats your breast. Dryden.

Ruvs, to which th' ignoble mind's a slave,
Is emulation in the learn'd or brave.

Pope, Essay on Man, II. 161.

Competition for the crown, there is none nor can be.

Bacon.

When the worship of rank and the worship of wealth are in competition, it may at least be said that the existence of the two bids diminishes by dividing the force of each superstition.

Locke, Eng. in 18th Cent., II.

Far sighted admonition of War and Waste
To fruitful strife and rivalries of peace.

Tennyson, Idylls of the King, Ded.

emulative (em'ū-lā-tiv), a. [L. emulatus, pp.: see the verb.] Inclined to emulation; rivaling; disposed to compete imitatively.

Yet since her swift departure thence she press'd,
He saw th' election on himself would rest:
While all, with emulative zeal, demand
To fill the number of th' elected band.

Hood, tr. of Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, v.

Emulative power

Flowed in thy line through undegenerate veins.
Wordsworth, Eccles. Sonnets, I. 27.

emulatively (em'ū-lā-tiv-ly), adv. In an emulative manner.

emulator (em'ū-lā-tor), n. [F. emulateur = Sp. Pg. emulador = It. emulatore, < L. emulatore, < emulari, emulate: see emulate.] One who emulates; an imitative rival or competitor.

As Virgil rivalled Homer, so Milton was the emulator of both these. Warburton, Divine Legation, II. § 4.

Fall of ambition, an envious emulator of every man's good parts, a secret and villainous contriver against his natural brother.

Shak., As you like it, I. 1.

emulatory (em'ū-lā-tō-ri), a. [L. emulatus, pp.: see the verb.] Arising out of emulation; of or belonging to emulation; denoting emulation.

Whether some secret and emulatory brawl passed between Zipporah and Miriam. Sp. Hall, Aaron and Miriam, At ale-drinking emulatory poems are sung Between chivalrous people.

Curry, Anc. Irish, II. xxi.

emulatrix (em'ū-lā-tres), n. [= F. emulatrice = It. emulatrice, < L. emulatrix, fem. of emulator: see emulator.] A woman who emulates. [Rare.]

Truth, whose mother is History, the emulatrix of time, the treasury of actions, the witness of things past and advertiser of things to come.

Shelton, tr. of Don Quixote, II. 1.

emule (em'ū-l), v. t. [Early mod. E. also a male: = OF. emuler = Sp. Pg. emular = It. emulare, < L. emulari, emulate: see emulate.] To emulate.

Yet, emulating my pipe, he took in hand
My pipe, before that emul'd of many.

Spenser, Colin Cloute, I. 72.

This is the ground whereon the young Nassau,
Emulating that day his ancestor's renown,
Received his hurt.

Southey, Pilgrimage to Waterloo, III.

emulger (ē-mul'j), v. t. [L. emulgere (> It. emulgere), milk out, drain out, < e, out, + mulgere = F. milk.] To drain out. Barley.

emulgence (ē-mul'jens), n. [emulgent: see emulgent.] The act of draining out. [Rare.]

Weak men would be rendered nervous by the flattery of a woman's worship; or they would be for returning it, at least partially, as though it could be banded to and fro without emulgence of the poetry.

G. Meredith, The Egoist, xiv.

emulgent (ē-mul'jent), a. and n. [= F. emulgent = Sp. Pg. It. emulgente, < L. emulgent (s), pp. of emulgere, milk out, drain out: see emulger.] 1. a. In anat., draining out: applied to the renal arteries and veins, as draining the urine from the blood.

II. n. 1. In anat., an emulgent vessel. — 2. In pharmacology, a remedy which excites the flow of bile.

emulous (em'ū-lus), a. [L. emulus, striving to equal or excel, rivaling; in a bad sense, envious, jealous; akin to imitari, imitate: see imitate.] 1. Desirous of equaling or excelling, as what one admires; inclined to imitative rivalry: with of before an object: as, emulous of another's example or virtues.

By strength

They measure all, of other's excellence
Not emulous. Macbeth, I. vi. 822.

The leaders picked men of a cool, calm, and vigor tried and augmented in fifty battles, are emulous to distinguish themselves above each other by new merits, as eloquence, hospitality, splendor of living.

Emerson, Writ.

2. Rivaling; competitive.

Both striving in emulous contention whether shall add more pleasure or more profit to the city.

Poet, Pilgrimage, p. 27.

3. Envious; jealous; contentiously eager.

He is not emulous, as Achilles is. Shak., T. and C., II. 1.

What the Gaul or Moor could not effect
Nor emulous Carthage with her length of spite Shall be the work of our. B. Jonson, Catiline emulously (em'ū-lus-ly), adv. With emulation, or desire of equaling or excelling.

So tempt they him, and emulously vie
To bribe a voice that empties what it buys.

Longfellow, To the End of Peterborough emulousness (em'ū-lus-ness), n. The quality of being emulous.

emulsic (ē-mul'sik), a. [emul (m) + ic.] In chem., pertaining to or prepared from emulsion.

Emulsic acid, an acid produced in the albumen of almonds.

emulsification (ē-mul-si-fikā'shon), n. The act of emulsifying, or the state of being emulsified.

emulsify (ē-mul'si-fī), v. t. [emul (m) + ify.] To make or form into an emulsion; emulsify.

Pancreatic juice emulsifies fat. Burton, Vegetable Mould, p. 22.

emulsin (ē-mul'sin), n. [L. emulsus, pp. of emulger, milk out, drain out (see emulsion), + -in.] In chem., an albuminous or caseous substance found in the white part of both sweet and bitter almonds, and making up about one quarter of their entire weight. When pure it is an odorless and tasteless white powder, which is soluble in water and acts as a ferment, converting the amygdalin of almonds into oil of bitter almonds, hydrogen cyanide, and a sugar.

emulsione, < L. as if emulsion* (n.), < emulsus, pp. of emulger, milk out, drain out: see emulger.] 1. A draining out.

Were it not for the emulsion to flesh and blood in being of a public factious spirit, I might pity your inhumanity.

Howard, Man of Newmarket.

2. A mixture of liquids insoluble in one another, where one is suspended in the other in the form of minute globules, as the fat (butter) in milk: as, an emulsion of cod-liver oil. — 3. A mixture in which solid particles are suspended in a liquid in which they are insoluble: as, a camphor emulsion. — 4. In photog., a name given to various emulsified mixtures used in making dry plates, etc. See photography.

emulsionize (ē-mul'shun-iz), v. t. [pret. and pp. emulsioned, pp. emulsionizing.] [emulsion + -ize.] To make an emulsion of; emulsify: as, pancreatic juice emulsifies fat.

This treatment, continued for seven or eight infants, suffices to set free the fat of the milk from its emulsified state.

Med. News, I. 587.

emulsive (ē-mul'siv), a. [= F. emulsi = Sp. Pg. It. emulsivo, < L. emulsus, pp. (see emulsion), + e, er.] 1. Softening. — 2. Yielding oil by expression: as, emulsive seeds. — 3. Producing or yielding a milk-like substance: as, emulsive acids. Emulsive oil, rancid olive-oil: in this state adapted for producing an emulsion, and used in dyeing as a fixing agent for aluminum or iron mordants.

emunctory (ē-mungk'ō-ri), a. and n. [= F. emunctoire = Sp. Pg. emunctorio = It. emunctorio, < L. emunctorius, adj., found only as a noun, neut., < L. L. emunctor, m., a pair of snuffers, < L. emunctus, pp. of emungere, wipe or blow the nose, < e, out, + ungere (nearly used), blow the nose, = Gr. ἀνοπεσθαι, mid. ἀνοπεσθαι, blow the nose; akin to mucus, q. v.] 1. a. Excretory; depuratory; serving to excrete, carry off, and discharge from the body waste products or effete matters.

II. n.; pl. emunctories (-ries). A part or an organ of the body which has an excretory or depuratory function; an organ or a part which eliminates effete or excrementitious matters or products of decomposition, as carbonic dioxide, urea, cholesterin, etc.

emuscation (ē-muskā'shon), n. [L. emuscare, clear from moss, < e, out, + muscus, moss.] A freeing from moss. [Rare.]

The most infallible art of emuscation is taking away the cause (which is superfluous moisture in clayey and spewing grounds), by draining with lime. Kedron, Syria, xix.

emu-wren (ē-mu-ren), n. A small Australian bird of the genus Stipiturus. The webs of the tail-feathers are decomposed, somewhat like the plumage of the emu. There are several species; S. malacurus is an example. See emu under Stipiturus.

emyd, emyde (em'id, em'id or -id), n. [= F. emyd.] A member of the family Emydidae; a fresh-water tortoise or terrapin.

Emyda (em'id-dā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑμύς or ἑμύς (Emys, Emys), the fresh-water tortoise, Emys latior: see Emys.] A genus of soft-shelled tortoises, of the family Trionychidae, having the shell very flat and subcircular in outline, and the toes webbed and with only three claws. They are aquatic, and are often found buried in the mud. A member of North America is a comparatively small species with a smooth shell. The genus is closely related to Aspideremys of Trionychidae.

Emydæ (em'id-dæ), n. pl. Same as Emydidae.

emyde, n. See emyd.

Emydæ (ē-mid'ē-g), n. pl. [NL., < Emys (Emyd) + -æ.] The name given by Huxley to a group of the Chelonidae, having usually horny cutting jaws, uncovered by lips, the tympanum exposed, the limbs slenderer than in Tetradonidae, with 5 clawed digits united by a web only, and the horny plates of the carapace and plastron well developed. The Emydæ as thus defined compose the river and marsh turtles and are divisible into two groups, the Terrapines and the Chelonidae. See Terrapin, Chelonidae.

emydian (ē-mid'ē-an), a. [Emys (Emyd) + -ian.] Of or pertaining to the group of tortoises typified by the genus Emys.

emydid (em'id-did), n. A tortoise of the family Emydidae.

Emydidae (ē-mid'id-dē), n. pl. [NL., also written contr. Emyde; < Emys (Emyd) + -idae.] A family of chelonians, the so-called fresh-water turtles, fresh-water tortoises, or terrapins. It includes a large group of diverse forms, some of which are as terrestrial as the true land turtles (Tetradonidae) and have a highly convex carapace though most are aquatic with flattened shell. There are about 60 species, of numerous genera, agreeing in their hard shell well formed for adapted both for walking and swimming, usually 4 toes before and 4 toes behind, and furnished with claws. They inhabit northern temperate and tropical regions within which they are widely distributed.

A few occur in salt or brackish water. The leading genera are Emys, Chelonia (the box-tortoises), Chelonia (the speckled turtles), etc. The salt-water terrapin of the Atlantic States, Malaclemys palustris, well known to epicures, belongs to this family. By some the name is supplanted by Clemmydidae, the genus Emys being referred to the family Cataglyphidae, and by others the family is considered to be inseparable from the Testudinidae. Also Emys. See cuts under carapace, Chelonia, and terrapin.

emydin (em'i-din), n. [Gr. ἑμυδῖν (ēmyd-ē), the fresh-water tortoise, + -in.] In chem., a white nitrogenous substance contained in the yolk of turtles' eggs. It is closely related to, if not identical with, vitellin.

Emydina (em-i-di-nā), n. [NL., Gr. ἑμυδῖν or ἑμυδῖν (ēmyd-ē), the fresh-water tortoise, + -ina.] A genus of fresh-water tortoises, typical of the Emydoidea.

Emydinae (em-i-di-nā), n. pl. [NL., Gr. ἑμυδῖν (ēmyd-ē) + -inae.] A subfamily of Emydoidea or Clemmydidae, typified by the genus Emys, and including most species of the family. It was limited by Gray to those tortoises which have the head covered with a thin hard skin, the zygomatic arch distinct, the fore limbs covered in front by thin scales and cross-bands, and the spreading toes strong and webbed.

Emydinidae (em-i-di-nā), n. pl. [NL., Gr. ἑμυδῖν (ēmyd-ē) + -idae.] A family of soft-shelled tortoises, typified by the genus Emys, including a few Asiatic species referred usually to the Trionychidae, having the edge of the disk strengthened by a series of internal bones, the skull oblong, convex, and swollen, and the palate with a central groove. Also Emydinadae.

emydoid (em'i-doid), a. and n. I. a. Resembling or related to a tortoise of the genus Emys; belonging to the family Emydoidea.

II. n. A tortoise of the family Emydoidea.

Emydoidea (em-i-doi-dē), n. pl. [NL., Gr. ἑμυδῖν (ēmyd-ē) + -oidea.] A family of tortoises, typified by the genus Emys, including the Clemmydidae and Cataglyphidae, and divided into 5 subfamilies. L. Agassiz. See cut under Cataglyphidae.

Emydosauria (em'i-dō-sū-ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., Gr. ἑμυδῖν (ēmyd-ē) or ἑμυδῖν (ēmyd-ē), the fresh-water tortoise, + -sauria, a lizard.] One of several names of the order Crocodylia: so called from the fact that the dermal armor of the crocodiles and alligators suggests the shell of a tortoise. De Blainville.

Emys (em'is), n. [NL., Gr. ἑμυδῖν or ἑμυδῖν, the fresh-water tortoise.] A genus of tortoises, giving name to the Emydoidea. The name has been variously employed: (a) For fresh water tortoises in general of the family Clemmydidae, such as E. latior of Europe, now generally called Clemmys caspica, and numerous American species. (b) Restricted to certain box-tortoises belonging to the family now called Cataglyphidae, such as the box tortoise of Europe, Emys europaea, which is the emys of Aristotle and the ancients, and the Emys blandingi of North America.

en (en), [Gr. ἐν, AS. en*, L. en, C. e, the usual assistant vowel, + n.] 1. The name of the letter N, n. It is rarely written, the symbol ŋ, being used instead.—2. In printing, a space half as wide as an em, sometimes used as a standard in reckoning the amount of a compositor's work. See em, 2.

en-1. [ME. en-, OF. en-, rarely F. en- = Sp. en- = It. en-, C. en-, L. in- (see in-2), an adverbial or prepositional prefix, conveying the idea, according as the verb is one of rest or of motion, of existence 'in' a place or thing, or of motion, direction, or inclination 'into' or 'to' a place or thing, C. in, prep., in, into, = E. in: see in.] In later L. in- usually became im-, and so in Rom. en- usually becomes im-, before labials: see em-1, im-2.] A common adverbial or prepositional prefix, representing Latin in-, meaning primarily 'in' or 'into'. Appearing first in Middle English words derived through Old French to Latin, en 1 (before labials) has come to be freely used as a prefix of words of native as well as of Romance or Latin origin, being equivalent to in 1 of pure English origin and to in 2 of direct Latin origin, and hence often referred to the pure Latin form. Hence forms in en 1 (em 1) and in 2 (im 2) are frequently found (even in Middle English) co-existing, as enbrace, include, enquire, inquire, enwrap, enfold, unfold, with, however, a tendency in one or other of the forms to disappear, or to become partly differentiated in use. Before labials en becomes im, as in enbelish, enbrace, but may remain unchanged before m as in enmence or emence. As a verbal prefix, en-, when joined to a noun, or a verb from a noun, may retain its original meaning of 'in' ('put in'), as in enwrap (put in a cage), enfold, enletter, enwrap, etc.; or when prefixed to an adjective or a noun, it may denote a change from one state into another ('make . . .'), as in enoble (make able), enrich, enlarge, enrichen, enlarge, and hence has often the effect simply of a verb-forming prefix. In some cases, prefixed to a verb, it has no additional force, as in enkindle, encompass.

en-2. [F., etc., en-, L. en-, Gr. ἐν (before gutturals h), a prefix conveying with verbs the idea of 'in' or 'at' a place, etc., with adjectives the possession of a quality, 'having,' with, 'in' en. [(1) ME. -en (sometimes spelled -in, -yn), later often -e, the two forms long coexisting; earliest ME. always -en (weak verbs -en or -ien), AS. -an (weak verbs -an or -ian, -igan), ONorth. -a, -ia = OS. -an (-on) = OFries. -a = D. -en = OHG. -an (-en, -on), MHG. G. -en = Lecl. -a (-ja) = Sw. -a (-ja) = Dan. -e = Goth. -an (-jan), the reg. Teut. inf. suffix, quite different from the L. inf. suffix, -re (-āre, -ēre, -īre), but cognate with Gr. -ειν, later reg. -ειν, and orig. dat. of ana*, an orig. noun suffix.

(= L. in, > en 1, above), C. in, prep., = L. in = E. in: see in.] An adverbial or prepositional prefix of Greek origin, meaning primarily 'in': chiefly in scientific or technical words of modern formation, as in encephalon, enanthema, etc.

Like forms are found in the other Teut. tongues, being worn-down and assimilated forms of elements orig. of different origin.] A termination of various origin, used in the formation of verbs. (a) The infinitive suffix, now obsolete, as in Middle English angen, escapen, pullen, etc.; modern English aven, escape, pull, etc. In late Middle English the -n fell away (aven, escape, pull, etc.), but the -e continued to be pronounced, at least optionally, until near the end of the Middle English period; in modern English the -e, though always silent, is retained in spelling after a single consonant following a long vowel (as in aven) and in some other positions. (b) The suffix of the past participle of strong verbs (Middle English and Anglo-Saxon -en, as in risen, written, etc.), past participles of rise, write, etc. In Middle English the -en fell away (risen or rise, written or write, etc.); hence in modern English many coexisting forms in -en and -e silent or absent, as broken and broke, written and wit, beaten and beat, sunk and sank, etc. In most of these pairs there is a slight differentiation of use (as unsunk, drunken, adj., sunk, drunk, pp.), or one form is obsolete (wit, pp., etc.) or regarded as "incorrect" (broke, speak, etc.), or is merely vulgar (rise for risen, etc.). In some cases the past participle in -en is modern, the verb being originally weak (with past participle in -ed), as in worn, pp. of wear. (c) In most of such instances the older form in -ed is still in prevalent use, as in aroused or arisen, saved or saven, proved or proven, etc., the -ed being in some instances absorbed, as in hid or hidden, chid or chidden. (d) A suffix forming verbs from adjectives, as weaken, fatten, etc. Originally such verbs were only intransitive ('become weak', etc.), but now they are also transitive ('make weak', etc.). (e) In Middle English, a plural suffix of verbs: as they arisen, written, arisen, written, etc. It is now reduced to silent -e or entirely lost.

en-2. [ME. -en, AS. -en = D. -en = OHG. G. -en, etc., = Goth. -in-s, -in-s = L. -inus = Gr. -ινος = Skt. -in-as, an adj. suffix, radically identical with en 1 (2), pp. suffix.] A suffix forming adjectives from nouns of material, as *ashen*¹, *ashen*², earthen, oaken, wooden, golden, sometimes simply -n, as cedarn, eldern, silvern, etc. Many such words are obsolete, dialectic, or archaic, as elmen, treen, clayen, haveren, etc.; many are also, some chiefly or exclusively, nouns, as aspen, linden, linden, wooden.

en-3. [ME. -en, AS. -en (gen. dat. -enne), earlier -in, -inne = OHG. -in (-inna), MHG. -in, -inne, G. -in = L. -ina (as in regina, queen) = Gr. -εινα, -εινα = Skt. -āni, fem. suffix.] A feminine suffix, of which only a few relics exist in native English words, as, for example, risen, from Anglo-Saxon fyrcen (= German fürstin), a female fox: in some instances regarded as having a diminutive force, as in maiden, from Anglo-Saxon maegden, etc. See maiden, and compare elfin.

en-4. [ME. -en, often -e, sud. with double pl. -en-e, AS. -an, the nom. acc. pl. (and gen. dat. etc. sing.) term. of weak nouns (nom. sing. masc. -a, fem. and neut. -e), = OS. -an = OHG. -an, MHG. G. -en = Goth. -ana = L. -inae (e. g., homines, pl. of homo) = Gr. -ωνες = Skt. -ān-as; being, in AS., etc., the stem suffix -an used as a sign of the pl., the real pl. suffix (-as, -es, -s) having fallen away.] The plural suffix of a few nouns, as oxen, brethren, children, and (archaic and poetical) eyen or eyes (= eyen), kneen (= kneen), shoon, dial. hosen, housen, peasen, etc. In these the termination is of Middle English origin, except in oxen (from Anglo-Saxon oxas), eyen, con (from Anglo-Saxon edgen), hosen (from Anglo-Saxon hossas), peasen (from Anglo-Saxon peasas).

en. A suffix of various other origins besides those mentioned above: often ultimately identical with -an (Latin -anus), as in citizen, denizen, dacien, etc., but having also, as in often, midden, etc., other sources ascertainable upon reference to the word concerned.

enable (e-nā'bl), v.; pret. and pp. enabled, ppr. enabling. [Formerly also inable; < ME. enablen; < en 1 + able.] I. trans. 1. To make able; furnish with adequate power, ability, means, or authority; render competent.

Temperance gives nature her full play, and enables her to exert herself in all her force and vigour.

Spectator, No. 128.

No science of heat was possible until the invention of the thermometer enabled men to measure the degrees of temperature.

J. Fiske, Comic Philos., I. 24.

2. To put in an efficient state or condition; endow; equip; fit out.

Joy openeth and enableth the heart.

Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, I.

You are beholden to them, sir, that have taken this pains for you, and my friend, Master Truewit, who enabled them for the business.

B. Jonson, Epicure, v. 1.

-syn. 1. To empower, qualify, capacitate.

II. intrans. To give ability or competency.

For matter of policy and government, that learning should rather hurt than enable thereunto is a thing very improbable.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, I. 16.

enablement (e-nā'bl-ment), n. [enable + -ment.] The act of enabling.

Learning . . . hath no less power and efficacy in enablement towards martial and military virtue and prowess.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, I. 22.

enach (en'āk), n. [Gael. einach, bounty.] In old Scots law, amends or satisfaction for a crime, fault, or trespass.

enact (e-nakt'), v. t. [ME. enacten; < en 1 + act.] 1. To decree; establish by the will of the supreme power; pass into a statute or established law; specifically, to perform the last act of a legislature to, as a bill, giving it validity as a law; give sanction to, as a bill.

Through all the periods and changes of the Church it hath been provid that God hath still reserved to himselfe the right of enacting Church-Government.

Milton, Church-Government, I. 2.

It was enacted that, for every town of Malmsey or Tyne who brought into England, ten good bowstaves should also be imported.

Knyce, Brit., II. 272.

2. To act; perform; effect.

The king enacts more wonders than a man,

Darling an opposite to every danger.

Shak., Rich. III., v. 4.

3. To act the part of; represent on or as on the stage.

Ham. And what did you enact?

Pol. I did enact Julius Caesar: I was killed 't the Capitol; Brutus killed me.

Shak., Hamlet, III. 2.

Enacting clause, the introductory clause of a legislative bill or act, beginning "Be it enacted by," etc. A common means of defeating a bill in its initial stages is a motion to strike out its enacting clause, which if successful carries all the rest with it.

enact, n. [ME.; < enact, v.] An enactment; an act.

This enacte so to endure by force of this present yelde (bill)

English Glde (E. E. T. S.), p. 204.

enactive (e-nak'tiv), a. [enact + -ive.] Having power to enact, or establish as a law.

enactment (e-nak'tment), n. [enact + -ment.]

1. The act of enacting or decreeing; specifically, the passing of a bill into a law; the act of giving validity to a law by vote or decree.

In 1176, precise enactment established the jury system, still rude and imperfect, as the usual mode of trial.

Welsh, Eng. Lit., I. 61.

2. A law enacted; a statute; an act.

If we look simply at the written enactments, we should conclude that a considerable portion of the pagan worship was, at an early period, absolutely and universally suppressed.

Lecky, Rationalism, I. 22.

3. The acting of a part or representation of a character in a play. -syn. 2. Statute, Ordinance, etc. See law.

enactor (e-nak'tor), n. [enact + -or.] 1. One who enacts or decrees; specifically, one who decrees or establishes a law.

This is an assertion by which the great Author of our nature, and Enactor of the law of good and evil, is highly dishonoured and blasphemed.

Rp. Atterbury, Sermons, II., Pref.

2. One who acts or performs. Shak.

enacture (e-nak'tūr), n. [enact + -ure.] Purpose; effect; action.

The violence of either grief or joy
Their own enactment will themselves destroy.
Shak., Hamlet, III. 2.

enaget, v. t. [OF. enagier, enagier, declare of age, pp. enagie, aged, < en- + aage, age: see age.] To age; make old.

That never hall did Harvest prejudice,
That never frost, nor snows, nor slippery ice
The fields en-ay'd.

Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II, Eden.

Enaliornis (e-nal-i-ór-nis), n. [< Gr. ἐναλίωρ, in, on, or of the sea (< ἐν, in, + αἰς, the sea), + ὄρνις, a bird.] A genus of fossil Cretaceous birds, discovered by Barrett in 1858 in the Upper Greensand of Cambridge, England. It was described by Seeley in 1866 under the name Pelagornis (P. barretti), which, being preoccupied by Pelagornis of Lartet (1857) was renamed Enaliornis by Seeley in 1869. The remains appear to be those of a true bird, resembling a penguin in some respects.

Enaliosaur (e-nal-i-ó-sár), n. One of the Enaliosauria.

Enaliosauria (e-nal-i-ó-sá-rí-á), n. pl. [NL. < Gr. ἐναλίωρ, living in the sea (< ἐν, = in, + αἰς, the sea), + σαῦρος, lizard.] A superordinal group of gigantic aquatic Mesozoic reptiles, with a very long body, naked leathery skin, paddle-like limbs, numerous teeth in long jaws, and biconcave vertebrae. The group contained the Ichthyosaurians, Plesiosaurians, and other marine monsters now placed in different orders. The term is now little used; it sometimes, however, still covers the two current orders Ichthyosauria and Plesiosauria, or Ichthyopterygia and Sauropterygia.

Enaliosaurian (e-nal-i-ó-sá-rí-an), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Enaliosauria.

II. n. One of the Enaliosauria; an enaliosaur.

enallage (e-nal-á-jé), n. [= F. enallage = Sp. enallage = Pg. It. enallage, < L. enallage, < Gr. ἐναλλαγή, an interchange, < ἐναλλάσσειν, interchange, < ἐν, in, + αλλάσσειν, change, < ἀλλάω, other: see allu-.] In gram., a figure consisting in the substitution of one form, inflection, or part of speech for another. Special names are given to subdivisions of this figure. The substitution of one part of speech for another is antiphrasis, that of one case for another is antiphrasis. Interchange of the functions of two cases in one phrase is a form of hypallage. Enallage of gender can hardly be illustrated in English. Antiphrasis is exemplified in the colloquial "It's me for." It is I. Enallage of number is seen in the royal and literary "we" for "I," and in our modern established "you" for "thou."

Not changing one word for another by their accidents or cases, as the Enallage.

Pattenham, Art of Eng. Poets, p. 143.

Enallotega (en-nal-ó-te-gá), n. pl. [NL. (F. Enallotegues, D'Orbigny), < Gr. ἐν, in, + ἄλλω, other (one besides), + τέγαι, roof.] A division of foraminifers, having the cells disposed in two alternating rows.

enambush (en-am-búsh), v. t. [< en- + ambush.] To place or conceal in ambush.

Explor'd th' embattled van, the deepening line,
Th' enambush'd phalanx, and the springing mine Cuthbert, Eng. on Capt. Hughes.

enamel (e-nam-el), n. [< ME. enamele (with prefix en-, due to the verb enamelen), prop. amale, amel, amell, amelle, amall, amayl, later ammell (> D. G. enamel = Dan. emalle = Sw. emall), < OP. enamel, F. email, enamel: see amel.] 1. In ceram., a vitrified substance, either transparent or opaque, applied as a coating to pottery and porcelain of many kinds. It is simply a fusible kind of glass, and when transparent is commonly called glaze. A vitreous coating of similar character is applied to a class of iron utensils for cooking, etc., and is made to serve other useful purposes.

2. In the fine arts, a vitreous substance or glass, opaque or transparent, and variously colored, applied as a coating on a surface of metal or of porcelain (see def. 1) for purposes of decoration. It consists of easily fusible salts, such as the silicates and borates of sodium, potassium, lead, etc., to which various earths and metallic oxides are added to give the desired colors. These enamels are now prepared in the form of sticks, like sealing wax, and for use are pulverized, and applied to the surface either dry or moistened so as to form a paste. The object to be enameled is then exposed to a moderate temperature in a muffle, and the vitreous substance becomes sufficiently fluid to form a brilliant and adhesive coating. Enamels in modern times include an infinite number of tints, but those of the ancient Orientals and of the Byzantine empire present but few colors, and those distinctly contrasting. See def. 3, and Limeglass enamel, below.

3. Enamel-work: a piece or sort of work whose chief decorative quality lies in the enamel itself: as, a fine piece of cloisonné enamel; a specimen of enamel à jour. Of this work there are three distinct classes: (1) cloisonné enamel, in which partitions surrounding the compartments of enamel of each different color are formed of wire of rectangular section secured to the body or foundation; (2) champlevé enamel, in which the surface of the background is engraved or hollowed out to receive the enamel; (3) surface enamel, in which the whole surface of a plate of metal is covered with the enamel, which when fused affords a smooth ground for painting. A familiar instance of the last kind of enamel-work is the dial of a common watch, which is enameled on copper in white, the figures being painted upon it in black enamel. Champlevé enamel is most used for jewelry and similar decorative work.

About her necke a sort of faire rubies
In white floures of right fine enamel
The Assembly of Ladies, I. 634

4. Any smooth, glossy surface resembling enamel, but produced by means of varnish or lacquer, or in some other way not involving vitrification: as, the enamel of enameled leather, paper, slate, etc.—5. In anat., the hardest part of a tooth; the very dense, smooth, glistening substance which crowns a tooth or coats a part of its surface: distinguished from dentin and from cement. It is always superficial, and represents a special modification of epithelial substance. It is usually white, sometimes red, as in the front teeth of most rodents, or reddish-black, as in the teeth of most shrews. See cut under tooth.

All the bones of the body are covered with a periotemum, except the teeth; where it ceases, and an enamel of ivory, which saws and files will hardly touch, comes into its place.
Paley, Nat. Theol., XI

6. Figuratively, gloss; polish.

There is none of the ingenuity of Filicla in the thought, none of the hard and brilliant enamel of Petrarch in the style.
Macauley

7. In cosmetics, a coating applied to the skin, giving the appearance of a beautiful complexion. Battersea enamel, a kind of surface enamel produced in Battersea, London, in the eighteenth century. The pieces of this enamel are usually decorated by a transfer process similar to that used for porcelain and English delft; they include medals, cases, etials, and especially plaques with portraits. Canton enamel, a variety of surface enamel in which the ground is usually plain white, yellow, or light blue, and is decorated with enamel paintings in many colors, representing conventional flowers, scrolls, etc. Vases, incense burners, etc., are made of it, and it is one of the most successful of modern Chinese artistic industries. Champlevé enamel, see def. 3, and champlevé. Cloisonné enamel, see def. 3, and cloisonné. Enamel à jour, a kind of enamel in which there is no background, the enamel being made to fill all the space between the narrow bars or wires which form the design. Such enamel which transmits light shows as a pattern seen by transmitted light.

Enamel columns, the minute six-sided prisms of which the enamel of the teeth is composed. Also called enamel prisms, enamel rods, and enamel fibers. Enamel cuticle, a thin horny cuticle covering the outer surface of the enamel in un worn teeth. Also called Nannula, membrana, and cuticula dentis. Enamel en basse taille, a variety of champlevé enamel in which the background of the lowered or sunken parts is sculptured with figures in relief, the enamel itself being transparent to allow them to be seen. Enamel en taille d'épargne, variety of champlevé enamel in which the field is also sculptured with figures or hollowed out for the reception of the enamel, leaving only narrow dividing lines of the metallic background.

Floated enamel, enamel used for ornamenting a glass surface which has been made stiff by grinding or by the use of acid. Glass enamel, an opaque or semi-opaque glass having a milky appearance, due to the addition of borax of tin. It is used for window transparencies, and "porcelain" lamp shades. Incrusted enamel, disks or small flat pieces of enameled metal baked in a larger surface of enameled metal or silver. Limoges enamel, a variety of surface enamel produced especially at Limoges in France, in which vessels and decorative pieces of various kinds and sizes are ornamented with pictorial subjects painted in many colors and in gold. This work reached its greatest excellence at the time of the Renaissance.

enamel (e-nam-el), v.; pret. and pp. enameled or enamelled, ppr. enameling or enamelling. [< ME. enamelen, enamaulen, < OF. enamailler, enameler, enamaler (in pp., < en- + amailer, > ME. amelen, amelen (see amel, v.), 1. amailer (> D. emaileren = G. emailieren) = Dan. emallere = Sw. emallera) = Sp. Ppr. emallan = It. smaltare, enamel; from the noun.] I. trans. 1. To lay enamel upon; cover or decorate with enamel.

Ther wet beakyns ful bryght of bronde golde clere, Enamayde with agt & coveys of kete
Alliterative Poem (ed. Morris), II. 1467

A knife he bore
Whose hilt was well enamelled or
With green leaves on a golden ground
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 107

2. To form a glossy surface like enamel upon; as, to enamel cardboard; specifically, to use an enamel upon the skin.—3. To variegate or adorn with different colors.

The pleasing tune that fragrant roses yield,
When wanton Zephyr, sighing on the field,
Enamels all
Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, I. 6

Enameled cloth. See cloth. Enameled glass. See glass.

II. intrans. To practise the use of enamel or the art of enamelling.

Though it were foolish to colour or enamel upon the glasses of telescopes yet to gild the tubes of them may render them more acceptable to the users, without lessening the clearness of the object.
Boyle.

enameler, enamellar (e-nam-el-ér), n. [< enamel + -er.] Consisting of enamel; resembling enamel; smooth; glossy. [Rare.]

enamel-blue (e-nam-el-blé), n. Same as small enamel.

enameler, enameller (e-nam-el-ér), n. [< enamel + -er.] One who enamels; one whose occupation is the laying on of enamels.

She put forth unto him a little rod or wand all dery, such as painters or enamellers use Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 401.

It is certain that in the reigns of the two first Edwards there were three enamellers in England, who both practised and taught the art. Malpore, Anecdotes, I. II, note.

Enamellers' copper. See copper.

enamel-germ (e-nam-el-jér-m), n. The epithelial germ of the enamel of teeth; the rudiment of the enamel-organ.

enamelist, enamellist (e-nam-el-ist), n. [< enamel + -ist.] Same as enameler.

enamel-kiln (e-nam-el-kil), n. A kiln in which pottery, glass, etc., are exposed to a low heat, such as is suitable for fixing enamel-colors, gold, etc. Such kilns are generally built of large earthenware slabs, having flues through which the smoke and flame of the fire pass without entering the body of the kiln.

enamellar, enameller, etc. See enameler, etc. enamel-membrano (e-nam-el-mem-brán), n. The layer of cylindrical cells of the enamel-organ of a tooth which stand on the surface of the dentinal part of a developing tooth.

enamel-organ (e-nam-el-ór-gán), n. The enamel-germ of a tooth after it has separated from the epithelium of the mouth and forms a cap over the dentinal portion of the tooth. It consists of a lining of cylindrical cells and a covering of cubical cells, and is wedged with stellate cells in abundant jelly-like intercellular substance.

enamel-painting (e-nam-el-pán-ting), n. Painting in vitrifiable colors, especially upon a surface of porcelain, glass, or metal, the work being subsequently fired in a muffle or kiln. See enamel.

enamorado (e-nam-o-rí-dá), n. [Sp. (= It. innamorato, q. v.), < ML. innamoratus, pp. innamoror, innamoror (> Sp., etc.), put in love; see amour.] One deeply in love.

An enamorado neglects all other things to accomplish his delight.
Sir T. Herbert, Travels in Africa, p. 74.

enamour (e-nam-ór), v. t. [Also written, but rarely, enamo; < ME. enamoured, pp. enamoured, enamorer, enamorer, F. enamorer = Pr. Sp. Ppr. enamorar, namorar = It. innamorare, < ML. innamorare, put in love, innamoror, be in love, < L. in, in, + amor (> F. amour, etc.), love; see amor, amorous.] To inflame with love; charm; captivate; used chiefly in the past participle, with of or with before the person or thing; as, to be enamoured of a lady; to be enamoured of or with books or science.

What trust is in these times?
They that when Richard liv'd would have him die,
Are now become enamour'd on his grave.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., I. 3.

Oh, death!
I am not yet enamour'd of this breath
So much that I dare leave it Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess, IV. 1.

Or should she, confident,
Desend with all her winning charms begirt
To enamour as the zone of Venus once Wrought that effect on Jove.
Milton, P. R., II. 214.

He became passionately enamoured of the shadow of a dream.
Living.

Syn. To fascinate, bewitch.

enamourite (e-nam-ó-rit), n. [< enamour + -ite, as in favorite.] A lover. [Rare.]

Is this no small servitude for an enamourite?
Burton, Annals of Mel., p. 510.

enamourment (e-nam-ór-ment), n. [< enamour + -ment.] (OF. enamourment, < enamorer, enamourer.) The state of being enamoured; a falling desperately in love. Mrs. Candee Clark.

enanthesma (en-an-thé-má), n. [NL. < Gr. ἐν, in, + ἄνθος, an anthos, an eruption; see enanthema.] In pathol., an eruption of the mucous membrane; distinguished from exanthema, an eruption of the skin.

enanthesis (en-an-thé-sis), n. [NL. < Gr. ἐν, in, + ἄνθος, blossom, < ἄνθω, blossom, bloom. Cf. enanthema.] In pathol., an eruption on the skin from internal disease, as in scarlet fever, measles, etc.

Whatever the method employed for encompassing his death, or wherever he may be found, the tiger proves him self a splendid beast.
P. Robinson, Under the Sun, p. 201.

-Syn. 2. To gird, invest, hem in, shut up.

encompassment (en-kum'pas-ment), n. [encompass + -ment.] 1. The act of encompassing, or the state of being encompassed.—2. Circumlocution in speaking; periphrasis. [Rare.]

And finding,
By this encompassment and drift of question,
That they do know my son, come you more nearer Than your particular demands will touch it.
Shak., Hamlet, II. 2.

encomy, n. [encomy, < L. encomium; see encomium.] Same as encomium.

Many popish parasites and men pleasing flatterers have written large commendations and encomies of those.
Sp. Bale, Select Works, p. 7.

Encope (en'kō-pē), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνκόπη, an incision, a hindrance, & ἐγκόπτω, make incisions, hinder, < en, in, + κόπτω, cut.] A genus of irregular clypeastroid sea-urchins, of the family Melittidae. It is notable for the massiveness of the calcareous test, and has a large lunule between the posterior ambulacra, in addition to five incisions opposite the ambulacra, as in E. emarginata. The mass of the test is greatest in E. grandis, a species of the west coast of Mexico.

Encope emarginata.

en coquille (on kō-kōly'). [F.: en, in; coquille, shell, cockle; see cockle.] In dress-making, etc., arranged in the shape of a scallop-shell; scalloped; imbricated: said of knots or rosettes of ribbons, trimmings, and the like.

encore (on-kōr'), adv. [F., < OF. encore = Pr. encara, enquara = OSp. encara = It. ancora, again, once more, < L. (in) hanc horam, lit. (to) this hour: hanc, acc. fem. of hic, this; horam, acc. of hora, > ult. E. hour.] Again; once more: used in calling for a repetition of a particular part in a theatrical or musical performance. This use is unknown to the French, who employ the word bis (twice, a second time) for the same purpose.

encore (on-kōr'), n. [encore, adv.] 1. A call by an audience for a repetition of some part of a performance.—2. A repeated performance; a repetition in or as if in response to a recall: as, the conductor refused to give any encores.

It was evident he felt this desire to be worth an encore: he repeated it more than once.
Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, xv.

encore (on-kōr'), v. t.; pret. and pp. encored, ppr. encoring. [encore, adv.] To call for a repetition of (a particular part of an entertainment).

Dolly, in her master's shop,
Encored them, as she twirls her mop.
W. B. Hichcock, Apology for Laureata.

encorporate, v. t. [ME. encorporen, encorporen, < OF. encorporar, < L. incorporare, embody, incorporate; see incorporate.] To incorporate.

Putte the element of watir, that is to seye, III lb of watir upon j lb of mater and putte by vij daies to encorporere wel as before in the bath of maichin.
Book of Quinte Essence (ed. Furnivall), p. 12.

And eek of our materis encorporing.
Chaucer, Canon's Yeoman's Tale (ed. Skeat), G. l. 812.

encorret, v. A Middle English form of incur.
encoubert (en-kō'bért), n. [Appar. a F. form of Sp. encubierto = Pg. encoberto, pp. of Sp. Pg. encubrir, Sp. also encubrir, cover, conceal, < en- + Sp. cubrir, cubrir = Pg. cubrir, cover; see cover.] A typical armadillo of the family Dasyopodidae and subfamily Dasyopodinae (which see), such as the peludo, Dasyops villosus. The term has had a more extensive application. See cut under armadillo.

en couchure (on kō-shür'). [F.: en, in; couchure, < coucher, lie down, couch; see couch.] In embroidery, made, according to an early fashion, with coarse gold thread or spangles sewed in rows one beside another.

encounter (en-koun'tér), v. [Formerly also in-counter; < ME. encountren, < OF. encontrer, en-cuntrer = Pr. Sp. Pg. encontrar = It. incontrare, meet, come against, < L. in, in, to, + contra, against; see counter, counter, and cf. reencounter, v.] 1. trans. 1. To come upon or against; meet with; especially, to meet casually, unexpectedly, reluctantly, or the like.

If I must die,
I will encounter darkness as a bride.
Shak., M. for M., III. 1.

When we came near any of these [Tonquin] Villages, we were commonly encountered with Beggars.
Dampier, Voyages, II. l. 14.

If it became him [the saint] to encounter the pain of sacrifice and to be "acquainted with grief," it behooved him also to triumph over both.
J. R. Seeley, Nat. Religion, p. 97.

2. To meet antagonistically; engage in conflict of any kind with; contend with; make an attack upon.

There are mice as fierce as our country dogs, and therefore they are hunted with dogs, because: as are not able to encounter them.
Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 52.

And as we find our passions do rebel,
Encounter them with reason.
B. Jonson, Volpone, III. 1.

3. To oppose; oppose.

Nothing is so unpleasant to a man, as to be encountered in his chief affection.
Purcell, Arts of Eng. Poets, p. 226.

James are not bound to believe two witnesses, if the probability of the fact does reasonably encounter them.
Sir M. Hale.

4. To befall; betide.

Good time encounter her! Shak., W. T., II. 1.

-Syn. 2. To confront, struggle with, contend against.
II. intrans. 1. To meet; come together; come into contact or collision.

Upon that were my thoughts tiring, when we encountered.
Shak., T. of A., III. 3.

More than once
Full met their stern encountering glance.
Scott, Marmion, III. 5.

2. To meet in opposition or conflict; come together in combat; contend; fight.

I prophesy thy death, my living sorrow,
If thou encounter with the law to-morrow.
Shak., Venus and Adonis, I. 672.

encounter (en-koun'ter), n. [Formerly also incounter; < ME. encontre (rare), < OF. encontre, F. encontre = Pr. encontre = Sp. encuentro = Pg. encontro = It. incontro, a meeting; from the verb. Cf. recounter, n.] 1. A meeting, particularly a sudden or accidental meeting, of two or more persons or bodies of any kind; a coming together or in contact.

To shun th' encounter of the vulgar crowd. Pope.

Specifically — 2. In physics, the coming within the sphere of one another's action of the rapidly moving molecules of a gaseous body. The word is so used by some writers in order to avoid collision, which might be understood to imply impact. The molecules of gases move in nearly rectilinear paths, until they come so close to one another that they are suddenly deflected. This very brief mutual action is the encounter. See gas.

When the distance between any two molecules is so small that they are capable of exerting sensible forces upon one another, there will be said to be an encounter between them.
H. W. Watson, Kinetic Theory of Gases, p. 27.

3. A meeting in opposition or conflict of any kind; a conflict; a battle; specifically, a contest between individuals or a small number of men, or an accidental meeting and fighting of detachments.

Full jolly knight he seemd, and faire did sit,
As one for knightly glads and brave encounters fit.
Spenser, F. Q., I. i. 1.

Leave this keen encounter of our wits.
Shak., Rich. III., I. 2.

Who ever knew Truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter?
Milton, Areopagitica, p. 62.

4. Manner of encountering; mode of account or address; behavior in intercourse.

Thus has he . . . only got the tune of the time, and outward habit of encounter.
Shak., Hamlet, v. 2.

-Syn. 3. Encounter, Renounter, Skirmish, Brush, collision, affair. As conflicts in war these are shorter, with fewer engaged, and of less importance, than those compared under battle. An encounter is often an accidental meeting, resulting in some conflict, but not suffered to grow into a general engagement. Renounter is the same thing, expressed by a term less common. A skirmish is an irregular or desultory contest between parts of armies, as scouting parties or skirmish-lines, not generally resulting in battle. A brush is short and sharp, perhaps engaging the whole of some force for a time, but not being pushed into a long or hard-fought struggle. See strife.

encounterer (en-koun'ter-er), n. 1. One who encounters; an opponent; an antagonist. — 2. One who goes to an encounter, or seeks encounters; one who is ready for encounter of any kind.

O, these encounterers, so glib of tongue,
That give a coming welcome ere it comes,
And wide unclasp the table of their thoughts
To every tickling reader! Shak., T. and C., IV. 5.

encourage (en-kur'aj), v. t.; pret. and pp. encouraged, ppr. encouraging. [Formerly also incourage; < OF. encourager, encouragier, encourager, F. encourager (= Pr. encorajar = Sp. Pg. encorajar = It. incoraggiare, incoraggiare), < En, in, + courage, courage, heart: see courage, n. and v. Cf. ML. incordari, encourage, inspire, < L. in, in, + cord (-) = E. heart.] 1. To give courage to; inspire with courage, spirit, or firmness of mind; incite to action or perseverance.

But charge Joshua, and encourage him. Deut. III. 28.
King Richard, to encourage his soldiers, made a solemn speech to them.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 253.

The actors behind the scene, who sacrificed this pause to his natural timidity, attempted to encourage him.
Goldenkirk, Vicar, xix.

2. To help forward; promote; give support to; as, to encourage manufactures.

The occupation dearest to his heart
Was to encourage goodness.
Cooper, Task, II. 702.

Whatever is meant by Christ's yoke being easy, Christ does not encourage sin.
J. H. Newman, Parochial Sermons, I. 101.

3. To make stronger.

Bramus had his Laguna or flagon of wine (recruited weekly from his friends at London) which he drank sometimes singly by itself, and sometimes encouraged his faint Ale with the mixture thereof.
Fuller, Hist. Cambridge, V. 48.

encouragement (en-kur'aj-ment), n. [Formerly also incouragement, incouragement; < OF. encouragement, encouragement, F. encouragement (= It. incoraggiamento, incoraggiamento), < encorager, encourager, encourager: see encourage and -ment.] 1. The act of encouraging, or of giving courage or confidence of success; incitement to action or to perseverance; a promoting or advancing.

Somewhat with merry purpose, fit to please,
And otherwhile with good encouragement.
Spenser, F. Q., VI. v. 82.

For when he dies, farewell all honour, bounty,
All generous encouragement of arts. Otway, Orphan.

As a general rule, Providence seldom vouchsafes to mortals any more than just that degree of encouragement which suffices to keep them at a reasonably full exertion of their powers.
Hawthorne, Seven Gables, III.

2. That which serves to excite courage or confidence; an encouraging fact or circumstance; an incentive or inducement; that which serves to promote or advance.

What encouragement is there to venture an acquaintance with the rash and unstable?
Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. xviii.

To think of his paternal care
Is a most sweet encouragement to prayer.
Byron, On the Lord's Prayer.

encourager (en-kur'aj-er), n. One who encourages, incites, or stimulates to action; one who promotes or advances.

He [Plato] would have women follow the camp, to be spectators and encouragers of noble actions.
Burton, Anat. of Med., p. 129.

The pope is a master of polite learning, and a great encourager of arts.
Addison.

The extraordinary collections made in every way by the late king [of Saxony], who was the greatest encourager of arts and sciences, and of every thing that is curious.
Pausanias, Description of the East, II. II. 235.

encouragingly (en-kur'aj-ing-ly), adv. In a manner to give courage or hope of success.

encribble (en-kri-bl), v. t.; pret. and pp. encribbled, ppr. encribbling. [en-1 + cribble.] To lay in a cradle.

Beginne from first, where he encribbled was In simple cradle, wrapt in a wad of hay.
Spenser, Hymn of Heavenly Love.

energetic (en-kra'tik), a. [en (Gr. ἐν), having power, possession, or control, self-controlling, < en, in, + spatos, power, strength, < spatos, strong, hard, = E. hard.] Of or pertaining to self-control and self-denial, especially in the forms of continence and fasting or abstinence from animal food.

Enkratism (en-kra'tizm), n. [enkrat-ic + -ism.] The principles of the Energetics; especially, the doctrine that the union of the sexes is essentially evil.

Enkratite (en-kra'tit), n. [en (L. Enkratita, < Gr. ἐγκρατία, pl. of ἐγκρατία, lit. the self-disciplined, continent, < ἐν, in, self-disciplined, continent, being master, being in possession of power, < en, in, + spatos, power, strength.) In the early history of the church, especially among the Gnostics, one of those ascetics who refrained from marriage and from the use of flesh-meat and wine. They were members of various heretical sects, although sometimes spoken of as a distinct body founded by the apostle Paul, of the second century. They were also called Continentes.

It was the heresy of the Gnostics that it was no matter how men lived, so they did but believe aright; which wicked doctrine Tatianus, a learned Christian, did so detect, that he fell into a quite contrary . . . and thence came the sect Enkratites.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 312.

enkraty (en-kra'ti), n. [en (Gr. ἐν), mastery, control, self-control, < ἐν, in, + spatos, having power, possession, or control: see energetic.] Mastery over the senses; abstinence from pleasures of sense; self-control, as exercised in fasting and continence, especially the latter.

The martyrs at Lyons, as we have seen, and it may be said the School of St. John in general, were distinguished by a noble moderation: by enkraty, or temperance, in the truest sense of the word. Mahan, Church History, p. 161.

encrease, v. An obsolete form of increase.
encrest, n. An obsolete variant of increase.
encrest, v. An obsolete form of increase.

Not doubting but, if the same may be continued amongst them, they shall so thereby be encreased in wealth, that they would not gladly be pulled therefrom.
State Papers, III. 202.

en crimson (en-krim'zun), v. t. [en-1 + crimson.] To make crimson; redden.

Look here what tributes wounded fancies sent me,
Of paled pearls, and rubies red as blood;
Figuring that they their passions likewise lent me,
Of grief and blushes, aptly understood
In bloodless white and the crimson'd mould.
Shak., Lover's Complaint, I. 201.

encrianal (en'kri-nal), a. [encri (ite) + -al.] Pertaining to an encriinite or encriinite, relating to or containing fossil crinoids; belonging to extinct forms of the order Crinoides (which see).

encriinic (en-kri-nik), a. [encri (ite) + -in.] Same as encrianal.

Encriinids (en-kri-ni'ds), n. pl. [NL., < Encriinus + -idae.] The former name of a family of crinoids which contained the permanently stalked forms, rooted during life. Nearly all the fossil forms, the stone-lilies or encriinids, are of this character. But the family was also represented by several living genera, or sea-lilies, as distinguished from the free feather-stars. It is now divided into numerous families. As now used by some authors, the family is restricted to stalked crinoids with a discoidal base, basal plates with well-developed axial canal, brachidia of two pieces, and generally without anal plates. They lived chiefly in the Triassic seas. See Crinoides.

encriinital (en'kri-ni-tal), a. [encri (ite) + -al.] Same as encrianal.

encriinite (en'kri-nit), n. [en (F. encriinite, < NL. encriinites, < Gr. ἐν, in, + spinos, a lily (see crinoid), + -ites, E. -ite.] Any fossil crinoid; a stone-lily; a term especially applied to the ordinary stalked form with a cylindrical stem and well-formed arms. Encriinites compose Encriinites (en-kri-ni'tes), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐν, in, + spinos, lily (see crinoid), + -ites, E. -ite.] The typical genus of the family Encriinuridae.

Encriinuridae (en-kri-ni-ur'i-de), n. pl. [NL., < Encriinurus + -idae.] A family of Silurian trilobites.
Encriinurus (en-kri-ni-ur'us), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐν, in, + spinos, lily (see crinoid), + -urus, tail.] The typical genus of the family Encriinuridae.
Encriinus (en'kri-nus), n. [NL., (Lamarck, 1816), < Gr. ἐν, in, + spinos, lily: see encriinite.] The name-giving genus of crinoids of the family Encriinidae, formerly of wide extent, but now restricted to a few closely related species. Also Encriinites.

encripsed (en-kript'), a. [en (ME. encripsed; pp. of encrips, < en-1 + crips.] Curled; formed in curls. [Rare.]

That shall have soft encripsed walls [wool]
And wondrous prolonged after the full.
Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 184.

With her hair [hairs] encripsed, yellow as the gold.
Shelton, Garden of Laurel, I. 200.

encroach (en-kroch'), v. [Formerly also incroach. < ME. encrochen, < OF. encrochier, encrocher, encroquer, encroquer, encroquer (ML. encrocare), seize upon, take, < En, in, + croch, a hook: see crook, and cf. acroach.] 1. trans. To seize; take; take possession of; get; obtain.

He enroaches kindly by craft of arms
Countrease and castles that to thy coroun lenger.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), I. 1248.
Thay ar happen also that for her harme wepe,
For thay schal comfort enroache in kythes ful mony.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), III. 18.

II. intrans. 1. To enter, intrude, or trespass upon the possessions, jurisdiction, rights, province, domain, or limits of some other person or thing; infringe upon or restrict another's right in any way; specifically, in law, to extend one's possession of land so as to transgress the boundary between it and the rightful possession or enjoyment of another or of the public: with on or upon before the object.
Exclude the enroaching cattle from thy ground.
Bryden.

Those who are gentle and uncomplaining, too candid to intrigue, too delicate to enroach, suffer much.
Mary Fuller, Woman in 19th Cent., p. 61.

Among primitive men, individual conflicts for food pass into conflicts between tribes, when, in pursuit of food, one enroaches on another's territory.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 448.

2. Figuratively, to intrude gradually; lay hold, as if by stealth or irresistible power: with on or upon before the object: as, old age is enroaching upon me.
Superstition, . . . a creeping and enroaching evil.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity.

And listened long to the sweet sounds that thrilled
The frosty air, till now the enroaching cold Recalled her to herself.
Bryant, Little People of the Snow.

=Syn. Trench upon, infringe upon, etc. (see trespass, v. 1.); to invade, violate, creep upon.

enroacht (en-kroch'), n. [enroach, v.] The act of enroaching; enroachment.

I cannot imagine that heretics who err fundamentally, and by consequence damnable, took the first rise, and began to set up with a fundamental error, but grew into it by insensible enroaches and gradual insinuations.
South, Works, IV. ix.

enroacher (en-kro'cher), n. One who enroaches; one who lessens or limits anything, as a right or privilege, by narrowing its boundaries.

Sir John Mason, Treasurer of the Queen's Chamber, a grave and learned man, but a great Usurper and Enroacher upon Ecclesiastical Livings.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 337.

The bold enroachers on the deep Gain by degrees huge tracts of land.
Nesbit, Run upon the Bankers, 1730.

enroachingly (en-kro'ching-li), adv. By enroachment.

enroachment (en-kroch'ment), n. [OF. enroachment, enroachment, enroachment; see enroach and ment.] 1. The act of enroaching or intruding or trespassing; an entering on the rights or possessions of another, and taking possession; unlawful intrusion in general; assumption of the rights and privileges of another.

It is the surest policy in princes
To govern well their own than seek enroachment Upon another's right.
Ford, Perkin Warbeck, III. 4.

But ambitious enroachments of the federal government on the authority of the state governments would not excite the opposition of a single state, or of a few states only.
Madison, The Federalist, No. xlv.

It will be seen that the system which effectually secured our liberties against the enroachments of kingly power gave birth to a new class of abuses from which absolute monarchies are exempt.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., I.

2. The thing taken by enroaching.

The general rule is that if the wrongful act is acquiesced in, the enroachment (i. e., the land added) is considered as annexed to the original holding.
Hapelja and Lawrence.

3. Figuratively, the act of intruding gradually and as if by stealth; approach, seizure, or progress: as, the enroachments of disease.

encrown, v. t. [ME. encrownen, OF. encoroner, en- + coroner, coronner, couronner, crown: see en-1 and crown.] To crown.

This lawe of armys was founded on the IX order of angellys in heven encrownt with precyous stonyes of colour and of vertues dyvers. Also of theym are figured the colours in armys.
Quoted in Booke of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), I. 103.

encrownment, n. [ME. encrownment, OF. encorouement, en- + coroner, crown: see encrown and ment.] Coronation.

Kepede fore encoroumentes of kynges encorountede.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), I. 4198.

encrust, en-crust, etc. See incrust, etc.
encrystal (en-kris'tal), v. t. [Formerly also encristal; en-1 + crystal.] To inclose in crystal; surround with or bury in ice.
We hear of some encrystal'd such as have
That, which produc'd their death, became their grave.
Carterright, On the Great Frost.

encuirass (en-kwé-rast' or en-kwé-rast'), v. t. [en-1 + cuirass + -ed.] In arch., furnished with a structure or outer coat likened to a cuirass, such as is developed by certain infusorians; loricate.

encumber, incumber (en-, in-kum'bér), v. t. [ME. encumbren, encumbren, OF. encumberer, encumberer (= Pr. encombrar = It. ingombrare), en- + combrer, cumber: see en-1 and cumber.] 1. To clog or impede with a load, burden, or other hindrance; render difficult or laborious in motion or operation; embarrass; overload; perplex; obstruct.

Into the bestes throte he shal hem caste,
To sleke hys hunger, and encumber hys toth.
Chaucer, Good Women, I. 2008.

Encumber neuere thy conscience for couetyse of Mede [Latin].
Though laden, not encumber'd with her spoil.
Couper, Tirocinium, I. 17.

Knowledge,
Till smooth'd, and squar'd, and fitted to its place,
Does but encumber whom it seems to enrich.
Couper, Task, vi. 95.

Specifically—2. To place (property) under a charge or servitude; load with debt or liability: as, to encumber an estate with mortgages, or with a widow's dower; an encumbered title. See encumbrance, 3. =Syn. 1. To oppress, overload, hinder, entangle, handicap, weigh down.

encumbert, n. [ME. encumber, OF. encombre, encombrer, v., encumber: see encumber, v.] An encumbrance; a hindrance.

Thel spede her lounyes that thei com to the Castell of Charyye with-oute any encumber, and thei thei made of the kyngs Bohors grete loys.
Mertin (E. E. T. S.), II. 358.

encumberingly, incumberingly (en-, in-kum'-bér-ing-li), adv. In a manner to encumber or impede.

encumbrment, n. [= F. encombrement = Pr. encombrament = It. ingombramento; as encumber + -ment.] The act of encumbering; obstruction; interference.

Into the sn of Spayn [they] wer drynen in a torment
Among the Sarazins, but God, that grace than lent,
Saued thaim alle the tyme fro ther encumbrment.
Rob. of Brinnis, tr. of Langtoft's Chron., p. 148.

The best aduysment was, of bad, to let her Sleepe out her fill without encumbrment.
Spenser, F. Q., VI. viii. 38.

encumbrance, incumbrance (en-, in-kum'-brans), n. [ME. encombrance, incumbrance, OF. encombrance, encombrer, encumber: see encumber.] 1. The act of encumbering, or the state of being encumbered.

Therefore, wyte ye well that this is the encumbrance of the deuill.
Mertin (E. E. T. S.), I. 5.

2. That which encumbers, burdens, or clogs; anything that impedes action, or renders it difficult and laborious; an obstruction or impediment; an embarrassment.

Let none thinke they incountred not with all manner of incumbrances.
Capt. John Smith, True Travels, II. 214.

Strip from the branching Alps their piny load,
The huge encumbrance of horric wood.
Thomson.

Specifically—3. In law, a charge or servitude affecting property, which diminishes the value of ownership, or may impair its enjoyment, so as to constitute a qualification or diminution of the rights of ownership. It does not impair ownership or power to convey, but implies a burden which will continue on the property in the hands of the purchaser. If a person owns only an undivided share in land, the share of his cotenant is not designated an encumbrance on his share; but if the land is subject to unpaid taxes or to a right of way, or if the land or one's share is subject to a mortgage or a mechanic's lien, it is said to be encumbered.

4. A family charge or care; especially, a child or a family of children: as, a widow without encumbrance or encumbrances. [Colloq.]—Covenant against encumbrances, a covenant, sometimes inserted in conveyances of land, that there are no encumbrances except such as may be specified.—Means encumbrances. See means. =Syn. 1. Burden, check, hindrance, drag, weight, dead weight.

encumbrancer, incumbrancer (en-, in-kum'-bran-sér), n. One who holds an encumbrance or a legal claim on an estate.

encumbrous, a. [ME. encumbrous, encumbrous, OF. encumbrus, encumbrus, encumbrus, encombre, n., encumber: see encumber, n.] Cumbrous; tedious; embarrassing; burdensome.

Fal encumbrous is the yugge.
Chaucer, Complaint of Venus, I. 62.

Whos sleues encumbrous so ayde trayle
Do to his lorde?
Book of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), I. 107.

To avoid many encumbrous arguments, which wit can deride against the truth, I send to your grace the copy of mine answer.
Strype, Cranmer, II. 3, note.

The circle of sciences; a general system of instruction in several or all departments of knowledge.
And therefore, in this encyclopedic and round of knowledge like the great and exemplary wheels of heaven, we must observe two circles.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., To the Reader.

Some by this art have become universally learned in a far larger compass than the old reputed encyclopedy.
Boyle, Works, VI. 335.

To Systematic Theology belongs also formal Encyclopædia, or an exhibition of theology as an organic whole, showing the relationship of the different parts, and their proper function and aim.

Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 5.

Specifically—2. A work in which the various topics included under several or all branches of knowledge are treated separately, and usually in alphabetical order.

It [a public library] should be rich in books of reference, in encyclopatias, where one may learn without cost of research what things are generally known. For it is far more useful to know these than to know those that are not generally known.
Lowell, Books and Libraries.

3. In a narrower sense, a cyclopedia. See cyclopedia, 1.

Abbreviated enc., ency., encyc.

French Encyclopædia (Encyclopédie ou Dictionnaire raisonné des sciences, etc.), a celebrated French work in 28 folio volumes (including 11 volumes of plates), the first of which appeared in 1751 and the last in 1765. Five volumes of supplements were issued in 1776-7, and two volumes of index in 1780, the complete work thus consisting of 35 volumes folio. The chief editor was Diderot, who was assisted by l'Alembert, and many of the great contemporary literary men of France (hence called the encyclopatists) contributed to it. From the skeptical character of many of the articles, the work excited the bitterest ecclesiastical enmity, and had no small part in bringing about the state of public opinion which prepared the way for the French revolution.

Science, IV. 113.

Specifically.—2. In minstrel-troupes, a man who sits at an end of the semicircle of performers during the opening part of the entertainment. In the early days of negro minstrelsy each troupe had two end-men, of whom one played the tambourine and the other the clappers or bones, and both alternately cracked jokes with the middle-man and told funny stories after each song sung by one of the company. The larger troupes have since had two, and sometimes four, of each class of end-men.

endmost (end-'mōst), a. superl. [< end + -most.] Situated at the very end; furthest.

endo- (en-'dō), [*< Gr. endo-, combining form of entro-, in, within, in the house, at home (= OL. entro-, entro-, in comp.; cf. intro-, within), < tv = L. in = E. in.] A prefix in words of Greek origin, signifying 'within,' 'inside': equivalent* to ento-: opposed to ecto- or exo-, and in some cases to apo-, epi-, and peri-.

Endless Screw and Wheel.

endoarian (en-dō-'á-ri-an), a. Having internal genitalia, as an actinozoan; of or pertaining to the Endoarri; not exoarian.

Endoarri (en-dō-'á-ri-i), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. entro-, within, + oapiov, dim. of ov = L. ovum, egg.] The actinozoans: so named by Rapp (1829), with reference to their internal genitalia: distinguished from Exoarri.

endoarteritis, endoarteritis (en-'dō-ár-'tē-ri-'tis, -ár-'tē-ri-'tis), n. [NL.] Same as endarteritis.

endobasidium (en-'dō-bá-sid-'i-um), n.; pl. endobasidia (-s). [NL., < Gr. entro-, within, + NL. basidium.] In mycol., a basidium that is inclosed in a dehiscient or indehiscient conceptacle, as in Gasteromycetes.

endoblast (en-'dō-blást), n. [*< Gr. entro-, within, + blastos, germ.*] In biol., the internal blastema or substance of the endoderm: same as hypoblast.

endoblastic (en-'dō-blás-'tik), a. [< endoblast + -ic.] Pertaining to endoblast; constituting or consisting of endoblast; endodermal; hypoblastic.

endocardiac (en-'dō-kár-'di-ak), a. [*< Gr. entro-, within, + kardia, = E. heart (see endocardium), + -ac. Cf. cardiac.]*

1. Situated within the heart.—2. Relating to the endocardium, or to the interior of the heart: as, an endocardiac sound or murmur.—3. Situated in the cardiac portion of the stomach.

endocardial (en-'dō-kár-'di-al), a. [*< Gr. entro-, within, + kardia, = E. heart (see endocardium), + -al.*] 1. Situated within the heart.—2. Pertaining to the endocardium.

Endocardines (en-'dō-kár-'di-néz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. entro-, within, + L. cardo (cardin-), a hinge: see cardo, cardinal.] A group of fossil (Cretaceous) lamellibranch mollusks, containing the Ruditae only, thus corresponding to the family Hippuritidae: opposed to Exocardines. They had an inner hinge, with teeth on one valve.

endocarditic (en-'dō-kár-'dit-'ik), a. [< endocarditis + -ic.] Pertaining to endocarditis.

endocarditis (en-'dō-kár-'di-'tis), n. [NL. (= F. endocardite, < endocardium + -itis.) In pathol., inflammation of the endocardium.

endocardium (en-'dō-kár-'di-um), n. [NL., < Gr. entro-, within, + kardia, = E. heart.] In anat., the lining of the heart, as distinguished from the pericardium, or investing membrane of that organ; the membrane forming the inner surface of the walls of the cardiac cavities, or this surface itself.

endocarp (en-'dō-kárp), n. [= F. endocarpe, < NL. endocarpium, < Gr. entro-, within, + karpós, fruit.] In bot., the inner wall of a pericarp which consists of two dissimilar layers. It may be hard and stony as in the plum and peach, membranous as in the apple, or fleshy as in the orange. The endocarp or stone, the epicarp or outer skin, and the mesocarp or fleshy part of a peach are shown in the cut.

Endocarpeae (en-'dō-kár-'pē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Endocarpon (the typical genus) + -ae.] In bot., a family of angiocarpous lichens having a foliaceous thallus. Also Endocarpei.

Endocarpeae (en-'dō-kár-'pē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. entro-, within, + karpós, fruit, + -ae.] In zool., a division of nematophorous (Ctenophora), containing those whose genitalia develop from the endoderm: opposed to Exocarpeae. The division contains the Scyphomedusae, and also the Actinozoa proper or Anthozoa. Hertwig Brothers, 1879.

endocarpein (en-'dō-kár-'pē-in), a. [< Endocarpeae + -in.] Same as endocarpeoid.

endocarpeoid (en-'dō-kár-'pōid), a. [< Endocarpeae + -oid.] In lichenology, having the apothecia sunken in the substance of the thallus, as in the genus Endocarpon.

Endocarpon (en-'dō-kár-'pōn), n. [NL., < Gr. entro-, within, + karpós, fruit.] In bot., the representative genus of Endocarpeae. It has the apothecia immersed in the thallus.

Endocephala (en-'dō-see-'fá-lá), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of endocephalus*: see endocephalous.] The headless mollusks: same as Accephala.

endocephalous (en-'dō-see-'fá-lus), a. [*< NL. endocephalus, < Gr. entro-, within, + kephalē, the head.] Having the head, as it were, within; acephalous or headless, as a lamellibranch mollusk; pertaining to the Endocephala.

Endoceratidae (en-dō-sēr'at'id), n. A fossil cephalopod of the family Endoceratidae.

Endoceratid (en-dō-sēr'at'id), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ēdos, within, + keras (keras-), horn, + -id.] A family of nautiloid cephalopods having large holocoeloid siphons, endocoelons or siphons, an endosiphon, and the whorls fusiform in transverse section. Hyatt, Proc. Biol. Soc. Nat. Hist., XXII, 266.

Endocervical (en-dō-sēr'vi-kal), n. [< Gr. ēdos, within, + L. cervix (cervic-), neck, + -al.] Pertaining to the inside of the cervix of the uterus.

Endocervicitis (en-dō-sēr'vi-si'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. ēdos, within, + L. cervix (cervic-), neck, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the lining of the cervix of the uterus.

Endochone (en-dō-kō'nē), n.; pl. endochonae (-nē). [NL., < (Gr. ēdos, within, + χώνη, a channel; see chone).] An endochone: distinguished from ectochone. Sollas.

Endochondral (en-dō-kōn'dral), a. [< Gr. ēdos, within, + χόνδρ, cartilage, + -al.] Situated within a cartilage.

Endochone (en-dō-kō'nē), n. [< NL. endochone.] The inner division of a chone. Sollas.

Endochoria (en-dō-kō'ri-on), n.; pl. endochoria (-ia). [NL., < Gr. ēdos, within, + χώρα, a membrane, the chorion.] In anat., the inner chorion; a term sometimes applied to the vascular layer of the allantois, lining the chorion.

Endochorionic (en-dō-kō'ri-on'ik), a. [< endochoria + -ic.] Pertaining to the endochorion.

Endochrome (en-dō-kō'mē), n. [NL., < Gr. ēdos, within, + χρῶμα, color.] In bot., a name given by Huxley to a supposed interior layer of the cuticle.

Endochrome (en-dō-kō'mē), n. [< Gr. ēdos, within, + χρῶμα, color.] 1. In bot., the brown cell contents in Diatomaceae, colored by diatomine. The term has also been applied generally to the coloring matter, other than green, of flowers, etc.—2. In zool., the highly colored endoplasm of a cell.—Endochrome plates, the colored portions of the cell contents of diatoms.

Endochyme (en-dō-kim), n. [NL., < Gr. ēdos, within, + χυμός, juice; see chyme.] In zool., the inner chyme-mass; endoplasm.

Endocline (en-dō-kil'nal), a. [< Gr. ēdos, within, + κλίμα, lean (see clime), + -al.] In bot., having the clinode (hymenium) inclosed in a conceptacle.

Endoclear (en-dō-sē'lār), a. [< Gr. ēdos, within, + καλός, hollow, καύα, the belly, + -ar.] Situated on the inner wall, or internal surface or visceral side, of the coloma or body-cavity; splanchnopleural: used chiefly of bodies derived from a four-layered germ, and hence with reference to the splanchnopleural or visceral division of the mesoderm: opposed to exoclear.

The intestinal fibrous layer. From this is developed finally, the endoclear that is the inner or visceral coloma epithelium, the layer of cells covering the outer surface of the whole intestine. Haeckel, Evol. (trans.), I, 271.

Endocolarum (en-dō-sē-lā'ri-um), n. [NL.: see endoclear.] In zool., the layer of cells forming the epithelium of the visceral or inner wall of the body-cavity; the visceral epithelium of the coloma.

Endocondyle (en-dō-kōn'dil), n. Same as entocondyle.

Endocone (en-dō-kōn), n. [< Gr. ēdos, within, + κωνή, cone.] One of the internal concentric cones formed by the sheaths of the siphons of some cephalopods, as those of the family Endoceratidae. Hyatt.

Endoconic (en-dō-kōn'ik), a. [< endocone + -ic.] Pertaining to the endocone of a cephalopod.

Endocranial (en-dō-kra'ni-al), a. [< endocranium + -al.] Pertaining to the endocranium; situated or taking place within the cranium.

Endocranium (en-dō-kra'ni-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ēdos, within, + κρανίον, the skull.] In zool., and anat., a collective name for the processes which project inward from the cranium of an animal, and serve to support the organs of the head: applied by Huxley to the hard pieces found in the head of an insect, and invisible without dissection. In the cockroach these form a continuous partition in the middle of the head, and they assume various forms in other insects. Also called tenipha, and by Kirby cephalopharynx.

These is (in the cockroach) a sort of internal skeleton (endocranium or tenipha), which extends as a cruciform partition from the inner face of the lateral walls of the cephalum . . . to the sides of the occipital foramen. Huxley, Anat. Invert, p. 343.

Endocrinatus (en-dō-kri'nāt), c. t. See indocrinatus.

Endocrinatus (en-dō-kri'nāt), c. t. [= F. endocrinatus = Fr. endocrinatus; as en- + doctrina.] Same as indocrinatus.

Endocyclic (en-dō-sik'lik), a. [< NL. endocyclicus, < Gr. ēdos, within, + κύκλος, circle.] Having a centric anus, as a regular sea-urchin; specifically, pertaining to the Endocyclia. Also endocyclical.

Endocyclia (en-dō-sik'h-kā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of endocyclicus; see endocyclic.] An order of echinoderms, containing the regular or desmoticous sea-urchins having the anus centric, as the eldards and ordinary sea eggs: same as Desmoticia: opposed to Exocyclia.

Endocyclical (en-dō-sik'h-kā), a. Same as endocyclic.

Endocyemate (en-dō-si'e-māt), a. [NL., < Gr. ēdos, within, + κύμα, an embryo (< κύμα, conceive), + -mat.] In embryol., developed in the manner characteristic of reptiles, birds, and mammals, in which the embryo is bodily invaginated in an involution of the blastodermic membrane, and an amnion is developed in consequence; amniotic and allantoic, as vertebrates above batrachians: opposed to epicyemate.

The formation of the amnion in the endocyemate type of the Chordata. J. A. Ryder, Amer. Nat. (1886) p. 1115.

Endocystis (en-dō-si's-tis), n.; pl. endocystes (-sēs). [NL., < Gr. ēdos, within, + κύστης, conception, < κύω, conceive.] The state or quality of being endocyemate; the process by which an endocyemate embryo becomes such.

Endocyst (en-dō-sist), n. [< Gr. ēdos, within, + κύστης, bladder; see cyst.] In zool., (a) The inner layer or membrane of the body-wall of a polyzoön. If there is no ectocyst, the endoderm forms the entire integument. (b) In Polyspongia, the proper ectodermal layer of the organism inside the hard ectocyst, together with the parietal layer of the mesoderm which lines and secretes the cells of the exoskeleton. See out under Plumatella.

Endoderm (en-dō-dērm), n. [< Gr. ēdos, within, + δέρμα, skin.] In zool., the completed inner layer of cells in all metazoan animals, formed by the cells of the hypoblast or endoblast, and representing, under whatever modification, the lining of the enteron: opposed to ectoderm. Primarily, it is the wall of the guttular body cavity, as the ectoderm is that of the whole body. Also entoderm. See out under Hydrozoa.

The inner, or endoderm, is formed by the "budding" of that layer into the space left by the dissolution of the central cells of the morula. W. B. Carpenter, Microsc., § 81.

Endodermal (en-dō-dēr'mal), a. [< endoderm + -al.] Of or pertaining to the endoderm; constituting an endoderm, consisting of endoderm. Also entodermal, endodermic, endodermic.

Endodermic (en-dō-dēr'mik), a. [< endoderm + -ic.] Same as endodermal.

Endodermis (en-dō-dēr'mis), n. [NL., < Gr. ēdos, within, + δέρμα, skin.] In bot., the layer of modified parenchymatous cells which are united to form the sheath surrounding a fibrovascular bundle.

Endoenteritis (en-dō-en'te-ri'tis), n. [NL.] Same as enteritis.

Endogamous (en-dō-gā'mus), a. [< endogamy + -ous.] Marrying or pertaining to the custom of marrying, within the tribe or group, pertaining to, practising, or characterized by endogamy: opposed to exogamous.

These [the Roman laws and confederations] forms appropriate to marriages between members of the same family group or tribe and . . . could only have originated among endogamous tribes. McLennan, Prim. Marriage, III.

The outer or endogamy is that within which a man or woman must marry has been really taken under the shelter of family and property. It is but faintly traced in Fug Island, though not wholly absent. Macfar, Early Law and Custom, p. 224.

Endogamy (en-dō-gā'mi), n. [< Gr. ēdos, within, + γάμος, marriage.] Marriage within the tribe: a custom among some savage peoples: opposed to exogamy.

The rule which declares the union of persons of the same blood to be incest has been hitherto unmodified. The words endogamy and exogamy (for which heirani is a better affix) parallel to appear to be well suited to express the ideas which have been in the mind of man and so have ventured to use them. McLennan, Prim. Marriage, III, note.

Essentially endogamy which at the onset must have characterized the more peaceful groups and which has prevailed as such has become less hostile. It is a constituent of the higher forms of the family. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 260.

Endogastritis (en-dō-gas'tri'tis), n. [< Gr. ēdos, within, + γαστήρ, stomach, + -itis; see gastritis.] In pathol., inflammation of the mucous membrane of the stomach; gastritis.

Endogen (en-dō-jen), n. [NL. endogenus, adj., < Gr. ēdos, within, + γενέω, producing; see gen-ous.] Of the like-formed (Gr. ēdos, γενέω), born in the house.] A plant belonging to one of the large primary classes into which the vegetable kingdom is divided: so named from the belief that the fibrovascular bundles were developed only about the center of the stem, in distinction from the exogenus or "outside growers"; a monocotyledon.

In their structure the endogens differ from the exogens chiefly in the absence of a cambium layer and in the course of the vascular bundles, which, instead of being parallel to each other in successive concentric rings have a variously oblique or curved direction, crossing each other and forming a stem which has ordinarily no distinction of pith or bark, and in cross section shows the bundles irregularly disposed either scattered over the whole surface or gathered more compactly toward the circumference. The other organs of the plants are also characteristic. The leaves are generally palmately veined the flowers usually have three organs in each whorl, the seed has an embryo with one cotyledon and the radicle issues from a sheath and is never developed into a tap root in germination. The endogens are divided into 14 natural orders including about 1,400 genera and from 10,000 to 20,000 species. By the characters of the inflorescence they are also distinguished as either apocarpous as in the Palmae and Araceae, petaloidous, as in the Orchidaceae, Palmae, Ericaceae and Amaranthaceae, or glumaceous, as in the Gramineae and Cyperaceae. These orders embrace over four fifths of the whole number of species the Orchidaceae alone including nearly 5,000. This class contains many of the most valuable food producing plants of the vegetable kingdom such as the cereals and forage plants among the grasses, the palms, plantains, etc.; and the petaloidous division supplies also very many of the most showy ornaments of the garden and greenhouse.

The structure of the roots of endogens and exogens is essentially the same in plan with that of their respective stems. W. B. Carpenter, Microsc., § 275.

Endogene (en-dō-jē-nē), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. (see plantar) of endogenous; see endogenous.] In bot., as a classifying name, the endogens. See monocotyledon.

Endogenetic (en-dō-jē-net'ik), a. Having an origin from internal causes: as, endogenetic diseases. Dungham.

Endogenous (en-dō-jē-nus), a. [< NL. endogenus; see endogen.] 1. In bot.: (a) Of or pertaining to the class of endogens; growing or proceeding from within: as, endogenous trees or plants; endogenous growth.

It is in the mode of arrangement of these bundles that the fundamental difference exists between the stems which are commonly designated as endogenous . . . and those which are more correctly termed exogenous. W. B. Carpenter, Microsc., § 268.

(b) Originating within; internal; specifically, formed within another body, as spores within a sporangium. The zygospore is strictly an endogenous formation. Boeck.

2. In anat.: (a) Same as autogenous. (b) Inclosed in a common cavity of the matrix, as cartilage cells. Endogenous cell-formation, the development of daughter cells within the mother cell.

Endogenously (en-dō-jē-nūs-lī), adv. In an endogenous manner; internally.

Endognathal (en-dō-gnā'thal), a. [< Gr. ēdos, within, + γάθος, jaw, + -al.] Of or pertaining to a modification of the three terminal joints of the gnathostegite or third thoracic appendage in brachyuran crustaceans. See gnathostegite.

The three terminal joints of the limb remain small, and constitute a palpiform appendage, the endognathal palp. Huxley, Anat. Invert, p. 210.

Endogonidium (en-dō-gō-ni'di-um), n.; pl. endogonidia (-ia). [NL., < Gr. ēdos, within, + NL. gonidium, q. v.] A gonidium (conidium) formed inside of a cell by free cell-formation, as in Haemaphysalis, Microspora, Vaukaria, the yeast-plant, etc. These endogonidia being set free by the dissolution of the wall of the parent cell soon enlarge and compact themselves as ordinary yeast cells. W. B. Carpenter, Microsc., § 213.

Part. 2. An Endogen
a Section of the stem of a palm; a, a portion of leaf-stalks; b, bundles of woody fibers; c, portion of stem, showing the ends of the bundles of woody fibers; d, endogenous leaf, showing its parallel veins; e, monocotyledonous root, showing (a) the single cotyledon; f, germination of palm; g, a cotyledon; h, a plumule; i, a root, showing, from a short shoot, the cotyledon, and a leaf of endogen.

endogonium (en-dō-gō'm-i-um), n. [NL, < Gr. endon, within, + gonos, seed.] In bot., the contents of the nucule of a chara. Treasury of Botany endolaryngeal (en-dō-lar'ing-e-al), a. [< Gr. endon, within, + larynx, larynx, + -al.] Situated within the larynx.

endolymph (en-dō-limf), n. [= l' endolymphic, < Gr. endon, within, + lymph, water, see lymph.] In anat., the peculiar limpid fluid which is contained within the membranous labyrinth of the ear, as distinguished from the perilymph, which surrounds it. Both in man and the bony labyrinth the endolymph may contain small cells called otoconia. It is also known as the cupula and the utricle of the ear.

endolymphatic (en-dō-lim-fat'ik), a. [< Gr. endon, within, + lymph, water (see lymph), + Gr. alyps, a vessel, + -al.] Situated or contained in lymphatic vessels. An epithet applied to certain nodules in serous membranes in relation with the lymphatic system, as opposed to perilymphatic ones, endolymphatic nodules.

endolymphatic (en-dō-lim-fat'ik), a. [< endolymph + -atic.] Pertaining to the endolymph, or to the cavity of the labyrinth which contains that fluid; endolymphatic us, the endolymphatic fluid (that is the endolymph), the endolymphatic duct (which persists in some vertebrates, as sharks, as a communication between the labyrinth and the exterior). See ductus.

endolymphic (en-dō-lim-fik), a. [< endolymph + -ic.] Of or pertaining to or of the nature of endolymph.

She [Laura Bingham] did not appear to be in the least ataxic, but it will be marked if such a thing is to come have. So well known to the king that she (from this) now generally supposed to be due to endolymphic pressure. G. S. Hall (German Culture) 10.

endomet (en-dom'), n. pl. endometes, pl. endometes, pl. endometes. To cover with or as if with a dome.

The blue Tussocky endomet
Our English was a prayer
Mrs. Dr. (Carter) Childs Grove at Elmore

endomersion (en-dō-mēr'shon), n. [< Gr. endon, within, + lymph (gloss) meros (n), a dipping in, immersion, < lymph, dip, see merge.] Imersion, a word used only in the phrase endomersion objective (which see, under objective, n.) endometrial (en-dō-mē-tri-al), a. [< endometrium + -al.] 1. Situated within the uterus. — 2. Pertaining to the endometrium.

endometritis (en-dō-mē-tri-tis), n. [NL, < endometrium + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the endometrium.

endometrium (en-dō-mē-tri-um), n. [NL, < Gr. endon, within, + metra, uterus, see metra.] The lining membrane of the uterus.

endomorph (en-dō-morf), n. [< Gr. endon, within, + morphe, form.] In mineral, a mineral enclosed in a crystal of another mineral. Thus there are found in quartz crystals, for example, small crystals of another mineral, etc.

endomorphic (en-dō-morf-ik), a. [< endomorph + -ic.] Occurring in the form of an endomorph; of or relating to minerals occurring as endomorphs.

endomychid (en-dom'ik-id), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Endomychidae. II. n. A member of the family Endomychidae, a fungus beetle.

Endomychidae (en-dom'ik-id), n. pl. [NL, < Endomychus + -idae.] A family of tricarinate or cryptotrimerous elytron beetles, related to the ladybirds or Coccinellidae. They have a slender maxillary palpi with the terminal joint (the long antennae and long elytra) (fungus beetles) of the prothorax the dorsal segments of the abdomen are not very numerous the ventral free the wings are small the first typically joined with the second joint of the last and the claws simple. There are about 100 species which live in fungi in both the larval and the mature state and are sometimes called fungus beetles. In some the last is evidently a jointed the family is most numerous in the tropics.

Endomychus (en-dom'ik-id), n. [NL, (Pavani, 1795), < Gr. endon, within, + mych, the innermost part, innermost part, corner, < mych, a close shut.] The typical genus of the family Endomychidae. Endomychus and Endomychus are examples. Endomychus is a British species. Endomychus is the only North American one.

Fungus beetle, Endomychus
Pavani, 1795. (Natural size)

endomysial (en-dō-mis'i-al), a. [< endomysium + -al.] Pertaining to or consisting of endomysium.

endomysium (en-dō-mis'i-um), n. [NL, < Gr. endon, within, + mys, muscle, see muscle.] In anat., the areolar tissue between the fibers of the fasciculi of muscles.

There seems to be a connection between the sarcolemma and the endomysium. Bucks Handl. of Med. Sci., v. 63 endonephritis (en-dō-nē-fr'i-tis), n. [NL, < Gr. endon, within, + NL nephritis, q. v.] Same as pyelitis.

endoneurial (en-dō-nū'ri-al), a. [< endoneurium + -al.] Pertaining to or consisting of endoneurium.

endoneurium (en-dō-nū'ri-um), n. [NL, < Gr. endon, within, + neuron, nerve.] In anat., the delicate connective tissue which supports and separates from one another the nerve-fibers within the funiculus.

endonucleolus (en-dō-nū-kle'o-lus), n. pl. endonucleoli (li). [NL, < Gr. endon, within, + NL nucleolus, q. v.] A highly refractive speck or particle of protoplasm in the interior of an ovum, an endoplastule.

The protoplasmic body very partly by the presence of a very large quantity of yolk granules. An ovum containing nucleolus and nucleolus is always visible after staining or crushing. R. H. Gibson (Frank R. S. J. Am. Nat.) 64 endoparasite (en-dō-par'a-sit), n. [< Gr. endon, within, + parasitos, parasite, see parasite.] An internal parasite, a parasite which lives in the internal parts or organs of the host as distinguished from an ectoparasite, which infests the skin or surface. The endozoans are of this character. The term has no classificatory meaning.

endoparasitic (en-dō-par'a-sit'ik), a. [< endoparasite + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of an endoparasite.

Dr. Grass has investigated the endoparasitic of fish and recognizes five families. Scott's Nat. Hist. p. 64 endopathic (en-dō-path'ik), a. [< Gr. endon, within, + pathos, suffering, + -ic.] In pathol., pertaining to the production of disease from causes within the body.

endopericarditic (en-dō-per'i-kar-dit'ik), a. [< endopericarditis + -ic.] Pertaining to the nature of, or affected with endopericarditis.

endopericarditis (en-dō-per'i-kar-dit'is), n. [< Gr. endon, within, + pericardium, pericardium, + -itis.] In pathol., simultaneous inflammation of the endocardium and pericardium.

endoperidia, n. pl. endoperidia. Plural of endoperidium.

endoperidial (en-dō-per'id-i-al), a. [< endoperidium + -al.] Pertaining to or of the character of an endoperidium.

endoperidium (en-dō-per'id-i-um), n. pl. endoperidia (li). [NL, < Gr. endon, within, + NL peridium, q. v.] The inner peridium where two are present, as in Geaster. Compare exoperidium.

endoperineuritis (en-dō-per'i-nū'ri-tis), n. [NL, < Gr. endon, within, + NL perineurium, q. v. + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the endoneurium and perineurium.

endophagous (en-dō-fā'g-us), a. [< Gr. endon, within, + phago, eat, + -ous.] Cannibalistic within the tribe given to endophagy.

endophagy (en-dō-fā'g-i), n. [< endophagous + -y.] Cannibalism practiced within the tribe, the practice of devouring one's relations.

endophlebitic (en-dō-flē-bit'ik), a. [< endophlebitis + -ic.] Pertaining to, of the nature of, or affected with endophlebitis.

endophlebitis (en-dō-flē-bit'is), n. [NL, < Gr. endon, within, + phlebitis, q. v. + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the inner coat of a vein.

endopleum (en-dō-plē'um), n. [NL, < Gr. endon, within, + phloem, bark.] In bot., the liber or inner bark. See phloem.

The inner coat of a Endopleum, which is more commonly known as phloem. B. C. (Cary) Micros., 472 endophragm (en-dō-frā'g-m), n. [< NL endophragma < Gr. endon, within, + phragma, a partition, ophragma, shut in fence, (cf. diaphragm).] In zool., a kind of diaphragm or partition formed by the plates of opposite sides of a somite of a crustacean.

endophragmal (en-dō-frā'g-mal), a. [< endophragm + -al.] Of or pertaining to an endophragm.

The internal face of the sternum wall of the whole of the thorax and of the post-oral part of the head presents a complicated arrangement of hard parts, which is known as the endophragmal system. Huxley, Crayfish, p. 133.

endophyllous (en-dō-fil'us), a. [< Gr. endon, within, + phylon (= L. folium, a leaf), + -ous.] In bot., being or formed within a sheaf, as the young leaves of monocotyledons.

endophthal (en-dō-ftal), a. [< endophyte + -al.] Same as entophytic.

endophyte (en-dō-fit), n. [< Gr. endon, within, + photon, a plant.] Same as entophyte.

endophytic (en-dō-fit'ik), a. [< endophyte + -ic.] In bot., same as entophytic.

endophytically (en-dō-fit'ik-al), adv. Same as entophytically.

endophytous (en-dō-fit'us), a. [< Gr. endon, within, + photon, a plant, + -ous.] In zool., penetrating within the substance of plants and trees, living within wood during a part of life, while some transformations are effected: said of the larvae of certain insects.

The larvae of the Endophytous are endophytous, boring the stems and roots of orchids and other plants. C. F. Riley.

endoplasm (en-dō-plāz-m), n. [< Gr. endon, within, + plasma, a thing formed, < plassein, form.] 1. In bot., the inner granular and somewhat fluid part of the protoplasm of a cell, as distinct from the ectoplasm. — 2. In zool., the interior protoplasm or sarcodeous substance of a protozoan, as a rhizopod, as distinguished from the ectoplasm. Same as endosarc. Also called chyme-mass, parenchyma.

endoplastic (en-dō-plāz'tik), a. [< endoplasm + -ic.] Pertaining to or formed of endoplasm.

endoplast (en-dō-plāst), n. [< NL endoplastum, < Gr. endon, within, + plastos, formed, molded, < plassein, form.] The so-called nucleus of protozoan animals. The endoplast is regarded as the homologous of the nucleus of any true cell of the metazoic animals. See cuts under Endoplasma and Parametrium.

The nucleus is a structure which is often wonderfully similar to the nucleus of a histological cell, but, as its identity with this is not fully made out, it may better be termed endoplast. In a few protozoa there are many endoplasts. Huxley, Anat. Invert. p. 74 endoplastic (en-dō-plāst'ik), a. [< endoplast + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to the endoplast; as, endoplastic substance. — 2. Having an endoplast, being one of the Endoplastica as, an endoplastic protozoan.

Also entoplastic.

Endoplastica (en-dō-plāst'ik-a), n. pl. [NL, neut. pl. of endoplasticus, endoplast.] A higher group of the Protozoa conveniently distinguished from the Monera or lower Protozoa by the possession of an endoplast, the so-called nucleus. See extract under endoplast, and monera. The leading divisions of the Endoplastica as named by Huxley are the Amoebae (the so-called Protozoa) Greenioidae, Infusoria, Radiolaria and probably the Catellaria.

The Protozoa are divisible into a lower and a higher group. In the latter the Endoplast is a certain portion of this substance (protoplasm) (the so-called nucleus) is distinguishable from the rest. (Note: I adopt this distinction as a matter of temporary convenience although I entertain great doubt whether it will stand the test of further investigation. Huxley, Anat. Invert. p. 73.

endoplastular (en-dō-plāst'u-lar), a. [< endoplastule + -ar.] Of or pertaining to an endoplastule; nucleolar.

endoplastule (en-dō-plāst'ul), n. [< endoplast + -ule.] The so-called nucleolus of Protozoa, as of an amoeba or other rhizopod, or of an infusorian, which may lie within or by the side of the endoplast. See cut under Parametrium.

Attached to one part of it (the endoplast) there is very generally a small oval or rounded body, the so-called nucleolus or endoplastule. Huxley, Anat. Invert. p. 73.

endopleura (en-dō-plē'ra), n. pl. endopleurae (re). [NL, < Gr. endon, within, + pleura, a rib, usually in pl., the ribs, the side.] In bot., the delicate inner coat of a seed. See cut under episperma.

endopleural (en-dō-plē'ral), a. [< endopleura (re) + -al.] Pertaining to an endopleurite. Also endopleuritic.

endopleurite (en-dō-plē'rit), n. [< Gr. endon, within, + E. pleura.] That part of the apodeme of a crustacean which arises from the intersegmental membrane which connects the somites; a pleural or lateral piece of the endothorax, as distinguished from an endosternite.

The floor of the thoracic cavity (of the crabs) is seen to be divided into a number of incomplete cells, or chambers by apodermal partitions, which are partly from the intersegmental, partly from the intersegmental mem-

... connecting every part of the body. The former portion of each apodeme is the endopneustic, the latter the endopneustic. . . . The endopneustic . . . divides into three apodemes, one descending or arthrodial, and two which pass nearly horizontally upwards.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 260.

endopneustic (en-dō-plō-rī'tik), a. [Gr. endō, within, + pneustic, blowing.] Same as endopneustic.

endopneustic (en-dō-plō-ton'ik), a. [Gr. endō, within, + pneustic, blowing.] An epithet applied by some geologists to rocks "supposed to have been generated within the first-formed crust of the earth."

endopodite (en-dop'ō-dī't), n. [Gr. endō, within, + podē (pod-) = E. foot, + -ite.] The inner one of the two main divisions of the typical limb of a crustacean: the opposite of exopodite. Both endopodite and exopodite are parts borne upon that part which is called the propodite, and both are variously modified in different parts of the body of the same animal. The endopodite may become a gill, etc. The endopodite becomes in the thoracic region an ambulatory limb, and is then the ordinary "leg" or "claw" of a crab or lobster. When thus fully developed, it consists of 7 joints. These are the coxopodite, the propodite, the ischopodite, the meropodite, the carpopodite, the dactylopodite, and the telopodite, named from base to tip of the leg, in Milne-Edwards and Huxley's nomenclature. The propodite or claw at the end of such a developed endopodite are the sixth and seventh of its joints, namely, the propodite and its movable appendage dactylopodite.

endopoditic (en-dop'ō-dī't'ik), a. [Gr. endopodite, + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the endopodite.

On the other hand, the inner or endopoditic division of the antenna becomes immensely lengthened, and at the same time annulated, while the outer or exopoditic division remains relatively short, and acquires its characteristic scale-like form.

endopoditic (en-dop'ō-dī't'ik), a. [Gr. endopodite, + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the endopodite.

In the Endopoda, . . . the endopodite is composed of only one layer, and the endoderm of the alimentary canal has no second or external coat. The perivisceral cavity, or interspace between the endoderm and ectoderm, is occupied by ramified mesodermal cells.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 511.

endoproctus (en-dō-prok'tū), n. pl. [N.L., neut. pl. of endoproctus; see endoproctus.] A division of the Polyzoa, established by Nitsche, having the anus inside of the circle of tentacles: opposed to Ectoprocta.

In the Endoprocta, . . . the endopodite is composed of only one layer, and the endoderm of the alimentary canal has no second or external coat. The perivisceral cavity, or interspace between the endoderm and ectoderm, is occupied by ramified mesodermal cells.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 511.

endoproctus (en-dō-prok'tū), a. [Gr. endō, within, + proctus, anus.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Endoprocta: as, an endoproctus polyzoon.

endopile (en-dop'il), a. [Gr. endō, within, + pile, feather, down, wing, leaf.] Same as monocotyledonous: an epithet proposed by Leaitibandis, because the plumule is included within the cotyledon.

endoral (en-dō-rāl), a. [Gr. endō, within, + oral, mouth, + -al.] Situated between the adoral and preoral cilia in certain Oryzias: said of certain cilia.

endore, r. l. [ME. endoren, endouren, < OF. endorer, gild, glaze, < en- + dorer, F. dorer, gild, < LL. deaurare, gild; see deaurate, and cf. adore, dorado, doryl.] In endore, to make of a bright golden color, as by the use of the yolks of eggs; glaze.

Endore hit with yolks of eggs then
With a taylor at fire.

Liber Cure Cocorum, p. 37.

Potage . . . with roasted mutton, veal, pork, Cheeky or endored pygmy.

endore, r. l. [ME. endoren, endouren, < OF. endorer, gild, glaze, < en- + dorer, F. dorer, gild, < LL. deaurare, gild; see deaurate, and cf. adore, dorado, doryl.] In endore, to make of a bright golden color, as by the use of the yolks of eggs; glaze.

endore, r. l. [ME. endoren, endouren, < OF. endorer, gild, glaze, < en- + dorer, F. dorer, gild, < LL. deaurare, gild; see deaurate, and cf. adore, dorado, doryl.] In endore, to make of a bright golden color, as by the use of the yolks of eggs; glaze.

endore, r. l. [ME. endoren, endouren, < OF. endorer, gild, glaze, < en- + dorer, F. dorer, gild, < LL. deaurare, gild; see deaurate, and cf. adore, dorado, doryl.] In endore, to make of a bright golden color, as by the use of the yolks of eggs; glaze.

endore, r. l. [ME. endoren, endouren, < OF. endorer, gild, glaze, < en- + dorer, F. dorer, gild, < LL. deaurare, gild; see deaurate, and cf. adore, dorado, doryl.] In endore, to make of a bright golden color, as by the use of the yolks of eggs; glaze.

endore, r. l. [ME. endoren, endouren, < OF. endorer, gild, glaze, < en- + dorer, F. dorer, gild, < LL. deaurare, gild; see deaurate, and cf. adore, dorado, doryl.] In endore, to make of a bright golden color, as by the use of the yolks of eggs; glaze.

endore, r. l. [ME. endoren, endouren, < OF. endorer, gild, glaze, < en- + dorer, F. dorer, gild, < LL. deaurare, gild; see deaurate, and cf. adore, dorado, doryl.] In endore, to make of a bright golden color, as by the use of the yolks of eggs; glaze.

endore, r. l. [ME. endoren, endouren, < OF. endorer, gild, glaze, < en- + dorer, F. dorer, gild, < LL. deaurare, gild; see deaurate, and cf. adore, dorado, doryl.] In endore, to make of a bright golden color, as by the use of the yolks of eggs; glaze.

endore, r. l. [ME. endoren, endouren, < OF. endorer, gild, glaze, < en- + dorer, F. dorer, gild, < LL. deaurare, gild; see deaurate, and cf. adore, dorado, doryl.] In endore, to make of a bright golden color, as by the use of the yolks of eggs; glaze.

endore, r. l. [ME. endoren, endouren, < OF. endorer, gild, glaze, < en- + dorer, F. dorer, gild, < LL. deaurare, gild; see deaurate, and cf. adore, dorado, doryl.] In endore, to make of a bright golden color, as by the use of the yolks of eggs; glaze.

salping (salping-), + -itis. In pathol., inflammation of the lining membrane of a Fallopian tube.

endosarc (en-dō-sārk), n. [Gr. endō, within, + sarkē (sark-), the flesh.] In zool., the inner or interior sarcode or protoplasm of the ameba or other protozoans, in any way distinguished from the exterior sarcodeous substance or ectosarc; endoplasm. It corresponds to the general substance of a cell, as distinguished from a cell wall and cell-nucleus. See end under Parametrium.

endosarcodous (en-dō-sārk'ō-dūs), a. [Gr. endō, within, + sarkē (sark-), the flesh, + -ous.] Same as endosarcous.

endosarcous (en-dō-sārk'ō-dūs), a. [Gr. endō, within, + sarkē (sark-), the flesh, + -ous.] Same as endosarcous.

endoscope (en-dō-skop), n. [Gr. endō, within, + skopē, view.] A diagnostic instrument designed for obtaining a view of some internal part of the body, especially the bladder, uterus, and stomach.

endoscopic (en-dō-skop'ik), a. [Gr. endō, within, + skopē, view.] 1. Pertaining to or effected by means of an endoscope. 2. In math., viewing coefficients with reference to their internal constitution as composed of roots or other elements. Thus, the methods of Lagrange and Abel for resolving an equation are endoscopic. J. J. Sylvester, 1853.

endosiphon (en-dō-sī'fon), n. [N.L., < Gr. endō, within, + siphōn, a tube.] The inner siphon of cephalopods; a median tube, inside the tube formed by the true funnels connecting the apices of the fleshy sheaths, and surrounded by a layer of shell.

This, the endosiphon, had the same thin covering as the sheaths themselves, or the secondary diaphragm.

A. Hyatt, Proc. Amer. Assoc. Adv. Sci., XXXII, 328.

endosiphonal (en-dō-sī'fon-āl), a. [Gr. endō, within, + siphōn, a tube, + -al.] Pertaining to or having the character of an endosiphon.

endosiphonate (en-dō-sī'fon-at), a. [Gr. endō, within, + siphōn, a tube, + -ate.] Having an endosiphon.

The endosiphonate and transitional types for cephalopods of these periods have a common character.

A. Hyatt, Proc. Amer. Assoc. Adv. Sci., XXXII, 328.

endoskeletal (en-dō-skel'e-tāl), a. [Gr. endō, within, + skelē, skeleton.] Of or pertaining to the endoskeleton.

endoskeleton (en-dō-skel'e-tōn), n. [N.L., < Gr. endō, within, + skelē, skeleton.] In anat., the internal skeleton or framework of the body; the whole bony, cartilaginous, cartilaginous, or other hard structure

Segment of endoskeleton in the thorax of a large fly (Tabanus). The central part of the diagram shows the endoskeleton, which is a hard structure within the body. The labels indicate various parts of the skeleton, including the head, thorax, and abdomen. The diagram is a cross-section, showing the internal structure of the body.

which lies within the integument, and is covered by flesh and skin, as distinguished from the exoskeleton. In man and nearly all other mammals it constitutes the whole skeleton. In invertebrates the term covers any hard internal framework supporting soft parts, as the apical system of arthropods, the cuticle of a squid, etc. The endoskeleton of vertebrates is divisible into two independent portions, the axial endoskeleton, belonging to the head and trunk, and the appendicular endoskeleton, to the limbs. The axial endoskeleton consists of the entire series of vertebral and cranial segments, including ribs, breastbone, head bones, and jaws. The appendicular endoskeleton consists of the bones of the limbs, regarded as diverging appendages, and the bones of the pectoral and pelvic arches (shoulder and hip girdles), by which these appendages are attached to the axial elements.

endosmic (en-dō-smik), a. Same as endosmotic.

endosmometer (en-dō-smō-mē'tēr), n. [= F. endosmometre; < Gr. endō, within, + smos, impulsion (see endosmosis), + metron, a measure.] An instrument for measuring the force of endosmotic action.

endosmometric (en-dō-smō-mē't'rik), a. [Gr. endō, within, + smos, impulsion, + -ic.] Pertaining to or designed for the measurement of endosmotic action.

endosmosis (en-dō-smō-sis), n. [= F. endosmose, < N.L. endosmosis, q. v.] Same as endosmosis.

M. Polsson has further attempted to show that the force of endosmosis may be considered as a particular modification of capillary action.

H. Newell.

endosmosis (en-dō-smō'sis), n. [N.L., < Gr. endō, within, + smos, impulsion, < smos, push, thrust, impel.] The transmission of a fluid inward through a porous septum or partition, which separates it from another fluid of different density: opposed to exosmosis; see osmosis. The general phenomenon of the interdiffusion of fluids through septa, including both endosmosis and exosmosis, is termed osmosis or osmotic, but endosmosis is also used in this sense. The phenomena differ from diffusion proper in being affected by the nature of the septum. Electrical endosmosis, the cataphoretic action of the electric current, the passage of an electrolyzed liquid through a diaphragm from the anode to the cathode. Some of the laws of the phenomenon have been made out, although it is not fully understood. The amount which passes is proportional to the intensity of the current and to the specific resistance of the liquid, and is independent of the area and thickness of the diaphragm. The hydrostatic pressure required to prevent the phenomenon is proportional to the thickness and inversely as the area of the diaphragm.

endosmotic (en-dō-smō't'ik), a. An inorganic form for endosmotic or endosmotic.

endosmotic (en-dō-smō't'ik), a. [Gr. endō, within, + smos, impulsion, + -ic.] Of or pertaining to endosmosis; of the nature of endosmosis. Also endosmotic.

Root pressure is probably a purely physical phenomenon, due to a kind of endosmotic action taking place in the root cells.

Gray, Botany, p. 174.

Endosmosis is independent of any interchange, since it results entirely from the attraction of the dissolving substance for the solvent; and this attraction is invariable at the same temperature, and may be termed endosmotic force.

Sachs, Botany (trans.), p. 287.

Endosmotic equivalent, the number expressing the ratio of the amount by weight of water which passes through a porous membrane into a saline solution to that of the amount of salt passing in the opposite direction.

endosmotically (en-dō-smō't'ik-lī), adv. By means of endosmosis; in an endosmotic manner.

The nutritive fluid passes endosmotically into the body parenchyma.

Gray, Zoology (trans.), p. 207.

endosomal (en-dō-sō-māl), a. [Gr. endō, within, + soma, body.] Of or pertaining to the endosome of a sponge.

endosome (en-dō-sō-m), n. [Gr. endō, within, + soma, body.] The innermost part of the body of a sponge, composed of endoderm and its associated deep mesoderm, exclusive of the choanosome; distinguished from both choanosome and ectosome.

In some sponges a part of the endoderm and associated mesoderm may likewise develop independently of the rest of the sponge, as in the Hyacinthella, where the choanosome forms a middle layer between a reticulation of ectosome on the one side and of endoderm and mesoderm, i. e., endosome, on the other.

Engelm. Bot., XXII, 416.

endosperm (en-dō-spēr'm), n. [Gr. endō, within, + sperma, seed.] In bot., the albumen of the seed; the substance stored in the ovule or seed about the embryo for its early nourishment. By recent authors it is limited to the deposit formed within the embryo sac. In some seeds, as of the Cucurbitaceae, there is an additional deposit within the testa, but outside of the embryo sac, which is distinguished as the perisperm. See albumen, 2, and endosperm.

The mesosperm of these plants gives rise to a small cellular prothallium bearing one or more archegonia, which in the Embryophyta extends beyond the limits of the spore, but does not become free from it. In the Phanerogamae, where it is termed the endosperm, it remains permanently enclosed.

Engelm. Bot., XX, 430.

endospermic (en-dō-spēr'm'ik), a. [Gr. endō, within, + sperma, seed, + -ic.] Containing or associated with endosperm: applied to seeds and albumen.

endospore (en-dō-spōr), n. [N.L. endosporeum, < Gr. endō, within, + spora, seed; see spore.] 1. In bot., the inner coat of a spore, corresponding to the intine of a pollen-grain. Compare epispore, exospore.

The further history has been traced out by Kirchner, who found that the endospore (germination commenced in February with the liberation of the spherical endospore from its envelope.

W. B. Carpenter, Microsc., p. 260.

2. In bacteriology, a spore formed within a cell, as distinguished from an athospore.

Also endosporium.

Endospores (en-dō-spō'rō's), n. pl. [N.L., < Gr. endō, within, + spora, seed, + -es.] The second of the two groups into which the Myxomycetes are divided. It is characterized by the production of spores enclosed within sporangia, and includes all of the order except the genus, which is referred to the Exosporales. It comprises 42 genera grouped under 18 so-called families.

endosporium (en-dō-spō'ri-um), n.; pl. endosporia (-iā). [NL.] Same as endospore.

The zygospore does not immediately germinate, but, after a longer or shorter period of rest the consporium and the endospore burst and a bud like process is thrown out. Huxley Biology, v.

endosporous (en-dō-spō'ru), a. [endospore + -ous.] Forming spores endogenously within a cell or spore-cavity in bacteriology, opposed to arthrosporous.

endost (en-dōs'), n. [endostereon = (G. endostereon = Dinn endostereon — Sw. endostera = Pr. endostar = Sp. endostar = Lg. endostar, < F. endostar, < OF. endostar, put on the back, indorse; < en, in, + dōs, < L. dorsum, the back see dorse, and < F. indorse indorse] 1. To put on the back; put on (armor).

They no sooner copied the morning's mistress with disheveled tresses, to mount her marble chariot, but they endosed on their armour. Knight of the Sea, quoted in Todd's Spenser, VI 294, note.

2. To write; engrave; carve.

Her name in every tree I will endose Spenser, (Colin Clout, I 632.

endostea, n. Plural of endosteum.

endosteal (en-dōs'tē-āl), a. [endosteum + -al] 1. Of or pertaining to the endosteum; situated in the interior of a bone — 2. Antogenous or endogenous, as the formation of bone; ossifying from the interior of a cartilaginous matrix.

The ossification of the human sternum is endosteal or commencing within the substance of the primitive hyaline cartilage. W H Flower Osteology, p 72.

3. Endoskeletal, as the bone or endosteum of a cuttlefish.

endosternite (en-dōs'tēr-nit), n. [Gr. ēdōs, within, + sternitē.] In zool., that part of an apodeme of a crustacean which arises from the intersternal membrane connecting successive somites; a sternal piece of the endothorax. See endopleurite. Milne-Edwards, Huxley endosteum (en-dōs'tē-um), n.; pl. endostea (-iā). [NL., < Gr. ēdōs, within, + stērion, a bone] 1. In anat., the lining membrane of the medullary cavity of a bone, the internal periosteum. It is a prolongation of the fibrovascular covering of a bone into its interior through the Haversian canals finally forming a delicate vascular membrane lining the medullary cavity.

2. Cuttlebone.

endostoma (en-dōs'tō-mā), n.; pl. endostoma (-mā). [NL., < (Gr. ēdōs, within, + stoma, the mouth.)] 1. In zool., a part situated behind and supporting the labrum in some Crustacea. — 2. In pathol., an osseous tumor within a bone.

endostome (en-dōs'tō-m), n. [Gr. ēdōs, within, + stoma, the mouth] 1. In bot. (a) The opening at the apex of the inner coat of the ovule. (b) The inner peristome of mosses. See cut under exostome — 2. In zool., same as endostoma.

endostosis (en-dōs'tō-sis), n. [NL., < (Gr. ēdōs, within, + stōsis, bone, + -osis.] 1. In pathol. the formation of an endostoma — 2. Ossification beginning in the substance of cartilage.

endostracal (en-dōs'tra-kāl), a. [Gr. ēdōs, within, + stērion, a bone] Pertaining to or consisting of endostrium.

endostracum (en-dōs'tra-kum), n. [NL., < Gr. ēdōs, within, + stērion, shell] The inner layer of the hard shell or exoskeleton of a crustacean.

endostyle (en-dōs'tīl), n. [Gr. ēdōs, within, + stōlos, a column; see style] 1. A longitudinal fold or diverticulum of the middle of the hemal wall of the pharynx of an ascidian which projects as a vertical ridge into the hemal sinus contained between the endoderm and ectoderm, but remains in free communication with the pharynx by a cleft upon its neural side. From one point of view it appears deceptively as a hollow rod whence the name. Huxley See cuts under Didemna and Panopaea.

2. Of or pertaining to or characteristic of the language spoken by the people of England and the peoples derived from them. See II., 2.—Early English architecture. See early.—English basement, bond, horn, etc. See the nouns.—English disease, rickets.

II. n. 1. Collectively, in the plural, the people of England; specifically, natives of England, or the people constituting the English race, particularly as distinguished from the Scotch, Welsh, and Irish.

There goes the Talbot, with his colours spread,
And all the troops of English after him. Shak., 1 Hen. VI., III, 3.

2. [ME. English, English, etc., < AS. Englisc, Englisce, neut. ad.] as noun (also with a noun, Englisce gepercord or getheod), the English language—that is, the language spoken by the Angles and, by extension, by the Saxons and other Low German tribes who composed the people called Anglo-Saxons. See etymology above, Anglo-Saxon, and def.] The language of the people of England and of the peoples derived from them, including those of English descent in the United States of America, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and the British dependencies in India Africa, and other parts of the world. The signification of the term English, as applied to language has varied with its changes of signification in political use. Originally applied to the language of the Angles, it came in time to be the general designation of the aggregate of slightly differing Low German dialects, Anglian and Saxon, which was recognized as the national tongue of the Teutonic invaders of Britain. This tongue, now generally known as Anglo-Saxon (see Anglo-Saxon), underwent in the course of time, by the Scandinavian invasion in the ninth century, and by the Norman conquest and the introduction of Norman French in the eleventh century, changes so extensive and profound as to make the "English" language of the later periods practically another tongue. Accordingly, the older stages of the language have at different periods received some special designation, as Saxon, Anglo-Saxon, English-Saxon, or Saxon-English for the language before the Norman conquest, and Old English or Early English for the period between the Norman conquest and the modern period. Recently some British scholars have insisted on using English to cover the whole range of the language, applying Old English, or, as some term it, Oldest English, to the Anglo-Saxon period. But, apart from the question as to the practical difference of the Anglo-Saxon and the language later called English, this tends to confusion, the term Old English having long had a distinct and well-understood application to the mixed language developed after the Norman conquest. Various divisions have been made of the periods of English. All are more or less arbitrary, there being no absolute gap even between the Anglo-Saxon and the following period. A common division, adopted in this dictionary, is as follows: (1) Anglo-Saxon, meaning usually and chiefly West Saxon, but including all other Anglo-Saxon dialects, Kentish, Mercian, Old Northumbrian, etc., from the middle of the fifth century, or rather from the seventh century, when the first contemporary records (in Anglo-Saxon) begin, to the middle or end of the twelfth century (A. D. 450 (600)-1150 (1200)); (2) Middle English, also called Old English, from the middle or end of the twelfth century to the beginning of the sixteenth century (A. D. 1150 (1200)-1600); (3) Modern English, or simply English, from the beginning of the sixteenth century to the present time. Each of these periods is divided, when convenient, into three subperiods by the terms early and late applied to the first and the last part of the main periods. The periods of transition cannot be exactly fixed, and in the etymologies of this dictionary the designation "early Middle English," for example, with reference to a word or form, may coincide in date with the designation "late Anglo-Saxon," as applied to another word or form of earlier aspect or spelling. So "early modern English," referring properly to the first part of the sixteenth century (A. D. 1500-1650), may in some cases refer back to the last decades of the fifteenth century, or, in regard to archaic forms and spellings, may extend to the end of the sixteenth century. In particular cases the date of the century or the date of the year is given. Philologically, English, considered with reference to its original form, Anglo-Saxon, and to the grammatical features which it retains of Anglo-Saxon origin, is the most conspicuous member of the Low German group of the Teutonic family, the other Low German languages being Old Saxon, Old Frisian, Old Low German, and other extinct forms, and the modern Dutch, Flemish, Frisian, and Low German (Platt Deutsch). These, with High German, constitute the "West Germanic" branch, as Gothic and the Scandinavian tongues constitute the "East Germanic" branch, of the Teutonic family. (See the terms used.) By mixture with the Celtic and Latin of the Anglo-Saxon period, and later with the kindred Scandinavian, and then with the Old French of the Norman and other dialects, especially with the Norman French as developed in England (the Anglo-French), and with later French, and finally, in consequence of the spread of English exploration, commerce, conquest, and colonization, with nearly all the other great languages of the globe, English has become the most composite language spoken by man. The vocabulary of common life is still about three-fourths of Anglo-Saxon origin; but the vocabulary of literature and commerce contains a majority of words of foreign origin, chiefly Latin or Greek, coming in great part through the Romance tongues, and of these chiefly through French. The languages from which the next greatest contributions have been received are the Scandinavian (Icelandic, Swedish, Danish, Norwegian), the Low German (Dutch, Flemish, etc.), Celtic, Hebrew, Persian, Arabic, Hindustani, Turkish, Malay, Chinese, American Indian, etc. The words derived from the more remote languages are, however, in great part names of products or customs peculiar to the countries concerned, and few of them enter into actual English use.

Ian Chaucer, well of English undefyled. Spenser, F. Q., IV, II, 32.

The critical study of English has but just commenced. We are at the beginning of a new era in its history. Great as are its powers, men are beginning to feel that its necessities are still greater. G. F. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., xxviii.

5. In billiards, a twisting or spinning motion imparted by a quick stroke on one side to the cue-ball. All deviations by the cue-ball from such motion as would naturally result from a straight central stroke with the cue, or from the slight given by impact on the side of an object-ball after such a stroke, are governed by the same principle; but as most force-shots have special names (draw, follow, massé, etc.), the word English is generally used only when the ball glances after impact in a direction more or less sharply angular from the object-ball or cushion. [E. S.]—Florio, English, See Anglo-Saxon.—Sandal-wood English. See the extract.

White men and natives communicate with each other (in the South Sea Islands) by means of a very singular language . . . known as Arad-wood English, or the "beche de mer language." Pop. Sci. Mo., XXX, 300.

In a quantity or degree that answers the purpose, satisfies, or is equal to the desires or wants; to a sufficient degree; sufficiently.

The way from Rome it ys knownen perlyghthly I enough with many Sundry persons to England, And ther for I Do not cryeth ill.
Torkington, Dirle of Eng. Travell, p. 67.

The land, behold, it is large enough for them.
Gen. xxxiv, 11.

I have seen many a philosopher whose world is large enough for only one person. Emerson, Society and Solitude.

2. To a notable extent; fairly; rather: used to denote a slight augmentation of the positive degree, the force depending upon the connection or the emphasis: as, he is ready enough to embrace the offer.

It is sometimes pleasant enough to consider the different notions which different persons have of the same thing.
Addison.

Another admired simile in the same play. . . though academical enough, is certainly just.
Goldsmith, Sequel to a Poetical Scale.

3. In a tolerable or passable degree: used to denote diminution, or a degree or quality rather less than is desired, or such a quantity or degree as commands acquiescence rather than full satisfaction: as, the performance is well enough.

I was . . . virtuous enough . . . swore little; died, not above seven times a week.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., III, 2.

Thou sing'st well enough for a shift.
Shak., Much Ado, II, 3.

4. To a great degree; very much.

Game of hounds: he how de him & of wilde best.
Robert of Gloucester, l. 375.

enough (ē-nuf''), interj. An elliptical exclamation, signifying 'it (or that) is enough,' 'I have had enough,' 'you have done enough,' etc.

Lay on, Macduff!
And damn'd be him that first cries "Hold, enough!"
Shak., Macbeth, v, 7.

Henceforth I'll bear
Affliction, till it do cry out itself, Enough, enough, and due.
Shak., Lear, IV, 6.

enounce (ē-nouns''), v. t.; pret. and pp. enounced, ppr. enouncing. [Cf. F. annoncer = Sp. Pg. enunciar = It. enunciare, enunciare, < L. enunciare, prop. enuntiare, say out, declare: see enunciate. Cf. announce, denounce, etc.] To utter; declare; enunciate; state, as a proposition or an argument.

Aristotle, in whose philosophy this presumption obtained the authority of a principle, thus enounces the argument.
Sir W. Hamilton.

Very few of the enlightened deputies who occasionally enounce the principle (the necessity of good roads for the nation) feel the necessity of having good roads in their own district.
D. M. Waller, Russia, p. 228.

enouncement (ē-nouns'ment'), n. [Cf. enounce + -ment.] The act of enouncing; enunciation.

It might seem to him too evidently included in the very conception of the argument to require enouncement.
Sir W. Hamilton.

enournt, v. t. See enorm.

enow (ē-nou''), a., n., and adv. A dialectal or obsolete form of enough.

enpaiet, v. t. A Middle English form of impair.

en passant (en pa-sānt'), [F.: en, in, < L. in; passant, verbal n. of passer, pass.] While passing; by the way: often used as introductory to an incidental remark or a sudden disconnected thought. In chess, when, on moving a pawn two squares, an adversary's pawn is at the time in such a position as to take the pawn moved if it were moved but one square, the moving pawn may be taken en passant, the phrase being used in its literal sense.

enpatron (en-pā'tron'), v. t. [Cf. en + patron.] To have under one's patronage or guardianship; be the patron saint of.

For these, of force, must your oblations be,
Since I their altar, you enpatron me.
Shak., Lover's Complaint, l. 234.

enpayet, enpaiet, v. t. Middle English forms of impair.

en pied (en pyä'), [F.: en, in, on; pied, < L. pes (ped-) = E. foot.] In scr., standing erect: said of a creature used as a bearing, especially a bear.

He swore consent to your succession,
His oath enrolled in the parliament.

Shak., 3 Hen. VI, II, 1.

An unwritten law of common right, so engraven in the hearts of our ancestors, and by them so constantly enjoyed and claimed, as that it needed not enrolling. Milton.

3. To roll; involve; wrap.

Great heaps of them, like sheep in narrow fold,
For hest did over runne, in dust enroll'd.

Spenser, F. Q., IV, III, 41.

To enroll one's self, to place one's name upon a roll or list; enlist as a soldier.

All the citizens capable of bearing arms enrolled themselves. Prescott.

—Syn. 1 and 2. Enroll, Register, etc. See record, enroll (en-ro'ler), n. [Formerly also inroller, cf. enrollleur.] One who enrolls or registers.

enrolment, enrollment (en-ro'l'ment), n. [Formerly also enrolment, < F. enrollement, < enroller, enroll: see enroll.] 1. The act of enrolling; specifically, the registering, recording, or entering of a deed, judgment, recognition, acknowledgment, etc., in a court of record. In chancery practice a decree, though awarded by the court, was not deemed fixed until it had been engrossed on parchment and delivered to the proper clerk as a roll of the court.

He appointed a general review to be made, and enrolment of all Macedonians. Holland, tr. of Livy, p. 123.

2. That in which anything is enrolled; a register; a roll.

The king himself caused them to be enrolled, and testified by a notary public, and delivered the enrolments, with his own hands, to the bishop of Salisbury. Sir J. Davies, State of Ireland.

Clerk of enrolments. See clerk. Statute of enrolment, an English statute of 1535, enacting that no land shall pass by bargain and sale unless it be by writing sealed, indented, and enrolled. Statute of enrolments. See statute.

enroot (en-root'), v. t. [en + root.] To fix by the root; fix fast; implant deep.

His face are so enrolled with his friends,
That, plucking to unfix an enemy,
He doth unfaden so and shake a friend.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., IV, 1.

enround (en-round'), v. t. [en + round.] 1. To make round; swell.

And other while an hen wol have the pippe,
A white pellet that wol the tongue enrounde,
And softly off wol with the nailes slippe.

Pulladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 22.

2. To environ; surround; inclose.

Upon his royal face there is no note
How dread an army hath enrounded him.

Shak., Hen. V., IV, (cho).

en route (on rüt). [F.: en, in; route, way, route: see route.] On the way; upon the road.

ens (enz), n.; pl. entat (en-shi-y). [ML., an oblique, < L. en (t)-s, ppr. of esse, be (first used, says Priscian, by Julius Caesar); formed after Gr. ἐν (en), the earlier form en* (t)-s appears in ab (en)-s, E. absent, ppr. sen (t)-s, E. present. See am (under be), and cf. essence.] 1. That which in any sense is; an object; something that can be named and spoken of.

Ens has been viewed as the primum cognitum by a large proportion, but not the majority of philosophers. Sir W. Hamilton, Reid's Works, p. 341.

To thee, Creator infinite,
O Entium Ens! divinely great

M. Green, The Spleen.

We cannot speak of a thing at all except in terms of feeling, cannot imagine an ens except in relation to a sentient. G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, II, v, § 13.

2. The same as first ens (which see, below). Johnson. Apparent or intentional ens, a real but unsubstantial appearance, as a rainbow. Complex ens, a fact, as that Columbus discovered America. Not to be confounded with a composite ens, which is an object composed of different objects. Dependent ens, that which is caused by another, opposed to independent ens. Ens of reason (ens rationis), a product of mental action. Ens per accidens, something existing only as an accident of a substance, or ens per se. Fictitious ens, a product of the inventive imagination. First ens, ens primum, with Paracelsus and other old chemists that which contains the virtue of the substance from which it is extracted.*****

This liquor, being sealed up in a convenient glass, must be exposed to the sun for about six weeks, at the end of which time there will swim at the top of it the primus ens of the plant in a liquid form, transparent and either green or red or perhaps of some other colour, according to the nature of the plant.

Bogly, Usefulness of Nat. Phil., II, Essay 5.

Imaginary ens, an object of imagination in its widest sense. Thus, an object remembered is an imaginary ens. Most perfect ens (ens realissimum), that whose essence involves all perfections, including existence.

Being is not a predicate which can be found in the subject of any judgment, and if we desire to add it synthetically, we must have some third term beyond the idea of the subject. Such third term, possible experience, is wanting in the case of the Ens Realissimum, which transcends experience. Adamson, Philos. of Kant.

Necessary ens, that the non-existence of which involves contradiction, owing to its having been defined as existent.

—Objective ens, something which exists in the mind, but only in so far as it is an object of perception. —Positive ens, something not a mere privation or negation. —Real ens, anything whose characters are independent of what any person or any number of persons may think them to be. —Relative or respective ens, something which exists only so far as a correlate exists. —Subjective ens, something which has an existence otherwise than merely as an object.

ensafet (en-saf'), v. t. [en + safe.] To render safe.

ensaint, v. t. [en + saint.] To canonize.

ensemble (F. pron. on-som'bl), n. [F. < ensemble, together: see ensemble, adv.] 1. The union of parts in a whole; all the parts of anything taken together, so that each part is considered only in relation to the whole; specifically, the general effect of a work of art, piece of music, drama, etc.—2. In music, the union of all the performers in a concerted composition, as in a chorus with full orchestral accompaniment.—3. In math., a manifold or collection of elements, discrete or continuous, finite, infinite, or superinfinite. The elements of the ensemble are usually termed its points. The integrant parts of an ensemble are all the other ensembles whose elements are elements of it. Two ensembles whose elements are capable of being put into a one-to-one correspondence with one another are said to have the same value or to be equivalent. The first value is the smallest infinite value, or that of the ensemble of positive whole numbers. A linear ensemble is one whose elements can be brought into correspondence each with a different point of one line. A derived ensemble is one which consists of all the limits of elements in a primitive ensemble. An ensemble is said to be condensed within a certain interval if there are elements of the ensemble in every part of the interval, however small. Disconnected ensembles are ensembles which have no common element. A generic ensemble is an ensemble such that every object is either determined to be an element of it or determined not to be so, and no object is determined in both ways. An ordered ensemble

William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 558.

Entedon (Entedon) (Cross shows natural size)

chalcid hymenopterous insects of the subfamily Entedoninae, as E. imbricatus.

Entedoninae (en'te-do-ni'ne), n. pl. [NL. < Entedon + -inae.] A subfamily of the parasitic hymenopterous family Chalcididae, distinguished by the four-jointed tarsi, the submarginal vein broken before reaching the costa, and the marginal vein reaching beyond the middle of the fore wing. The species are all parasitic many of them being secondary parasites—that is, parasitic upon parasites. Also in the form Entedonidae.

entelechy (en-toi'e-ki), n. [< L. entelechia, < Gr. entelechia, actuality, < en, in, + teleō, complete (cf. teleō, complete, full): en, in; teleō, dat. of teleō, end, completion; teleō, have, hold, intr. be.] Realization; opposed to power or potentiality, and nearly the same as energy or act (actuality). The only difference is that entelechy implies a more perfect realization. The idea of entelechy is connected with that of form, the idea of power with that of matter. Thus, iron is potentially in its ore, which to be made iron must be worked; when this is done, the iron exists in entelechy. The development from being in power or in form to entelechy takes place, according to Aristotle, by means of a change, the imperfect action or energy, of which the perfected result is the entelechy. Entelechy is, however, either first or second. First entelechy is being in working order, second entelechy is being in action. The soul is said to be the first entelechy of the body, which seems to imply that it grows out of the body as its germ; but the idea more insisted upon is that man without the soul would be but a body, while the soul, once developed, is not lost when the man sleeps. Aristotle terms this plastic nature (which see, under nature) a first entelechy, and Leibnitz calls a monad an entelechy.

To express this aspect of the mental functions, Aristotle makes use of the word entelechy. The word is one which explains itself. Frequently it is true Aristotle fails to draw any strict line of demarcation between entelechy and energy; but in theory, at least, the two are definitely separated from each other, and entelechy represents merely a stage on the path toward entelechy. Entelechy in short is the realization which contains the end of a process: the complete expression of some function—the perfection of some phenomenon, the last stage in that process from potentiality to reality which we have already noticed. Soul then is not only the realization of the body; it is its perfect realization or full development.

E. Wallace, Aristotle's Psychology, p. xiii.

entellus (en-tel'us), n. [NL. < Gr. enteleus, command, enjoin, < en, in, + teleō, make to arise, make accomplish.] The commonest semnopithecoid monkey of India, Semnopithecus entellus, indigenous to the hot regions of the Gangetic basins, but introduced in other parts of India, where it is held in veneration and treated with great honor by the natives. It is one of the slow or sedate monkeys, having little of the restlessness characteristic of most of the tribe, and is of moderate size, yellowish color, reddening on the limbs, with black hands and feet and blackish face. The most conspicuous feature is the cap of fur radiating from the top of the head, and peaked over the eyebrows, with full whiskers and beard on the cheeks and chin. The length of the head and body is about 2 feet, that of the tail about 3, the latter is not prehensile. Also called hanuman.

Entellus, Semnopithecus entellus entempest (en-tem'pest), v. t. [< en-1 + tempest.] To disturb as by a tempest; visit with storm. [Poetical.]
